PREFACE.

IN presenting this Work to the Public, I obey the dictates of a duty incumbent on every person, the incidents of whose life have afforded him an opportunity of visiting countries that are either unknown, or imperfectly described ; and, by communicating his information, to add somewhat to the stock of general knowledge.

Of the kingdom of Ava, or the Birman Empire, so little is known to the European world, that many persons of liberal education, when the name of the country has been mentioned, were at a loss on what part of the globe to seek for its position; and some were even unacquainted with the existence of such a nation.

This obscurity renders any apology for introducing my Work to the Public unnecessary; and I have only to lament my own inability to do justice to so important a subject. The military profession, in every part of the world, is unpropitious to literary attainments ; but in India, where no repositories of European learning are to be found, and armies are continually moving over a vast region, it can hardly be expected that the soldier and the scholar should be united. It has been my lot to serve in that distant country from an early age, until I attained the meridian of life ; and it may perhaps soften criticism, that I aspire not to the ornaments of language, and little aim at a polished structure of style : I have written my own book ; my chief object is, to be intelligible ; and my single claim, to be believed.

The rise and fortunes of Alompra, and the establishment of the present Birman dynasty, supply a short, but highly interesting, period of oriental history; these extraordinary events, having happened within the memory of many persons still living, are authenticated by individuals who themselves bore a part in the transactions: and although their relations are liable to that bias which is inseparable from the human mind, when the passions are engaged, and self-interest is concerned; yet the leading facts are such as do not admit of misrepresentation; to these, therefore, I have confined myself, as closely as perspicuity would allow.

For the account of the disastrous fate of our countrymen at Negrais, and the destruction of the English and French factories, I am chiefly indebted to the repertory of Mr. Dalrymple; a most useful and judicious compilation, which has rescued from oblivion many valuable and curious papers.

The invasion of Ava by the Chinese during the reign of King Shembuan, and the subsequent expedition into the Cassay country, were recounted to me by an old Mussulman soldier who bore arms in both: he could have no inducement to deceive, and the leading circumstances of his narrative were confirmed from other quarters.

The events which took place in the southern countries, in Pegue and Siam, were so generally known, that inquiry need only be made to obtain information.

I am obliged to the kindness of Mr. Dalrymple for the construction of the General Map prefixed to this Work, which has been compiled from the materials collected by Dr. Buchanan, and transmitted to the Court of Directors; it is laid down on a contracted scale, being designed merely to point out the relative situation of the kingdom of Ava, with reference to other countries, and to ascertain its local position on the globe. The materials requisite to give an accurate topographical display of all the parts of so extensive an empire, could not be procured during the short period of our residence; but the ability and indefatigable industry of Dr. Buchanan have effected much, to which the astronomical labours of Mr. Wood have considerably added. I cannot better do justice to the merits of these gentlemen, than by inserting the words of Mr. Dalrymple in a note on the subject of Ava geography.

“ This part of Indian geogra“ phy has hitherto remained in “ inexplicable obscurity, although “ much light has been thrown on “ the subject in consequence of “ the Embassy, of which this “ Work lays an account before
“ the Public, not only from “ the astronomical observations by “ Ensign Thomas Wood, which “ do him the greatest credit, but
“ from the great mass of native
“ geography, which the assiduous “ pains of Dr. Buchanan, who ac“ companied the Embassy in a “ medical capacity, have accumu“ lated from various persons.

“ These maps obtained by Dr.

“ Buchanan from the natives, al“ though they elucidate the geo“ graphy, cannot be considered as “ positive documents for the con“ struction of an accurate Map of “ these countries, not being laid “ down geometrically, nor having “ even scales affixed ; indeed, it is “ not certain that any of them “ were meant to be laid down by “ an uniform scale ; the wonder is,
“ that there should be any thing
“ like uniformity.”

The applause of such respectable authority, cannot be enhanced by an encomium of mine. I am, however, happy in having an opportunity to acknowledge the able and friendly assistance which I received from these gentlemen: my thanks are also due to Captain Thomas, commander of the Sea-Horse, for his circumspect and prudent conduct in conciliating the inhabitants of Rangoon, during the time that I was absent at Ummerapoor.

Major Rennell, who never denies the use of his invaluable publications, to those who may require extracts from them to illustrate their own works, has been so good as to allow me to copy from his Map of Hindostan a part of the Pegue coast, which we had not an opportunity of observing.

The representations of the costume of the country, I am persuaded, are as faithful as pencil can delineate : the native painters of India do not possess a genius for fiction, or works of fancy ; they cannot invent or even embellish, and they are utterly ignorant of perspective ; but they draw figures, and trace every line of a picture, with a laborious exactness peculiar to themselves : the Plate of the Kioum, or monastery, Vol. III. p. 107, affords a curious specimen of their minute accuracy.

The Plate which represents the introduction of the English gentlemen, Vol. III. p. 168, does not include all the objects that were in the original drawing, there not being sufficient room to admit them ; it, however, exhibits a just view of the manner in which the Court was assembled. A print cannot convey an adequate idea of the brilliancy of the dresses, or of the general effect.

The method of catching wild elephants in Ava, I was assured, was faithfully delineated in the Drawing from which the Plate, Vol. III. p. 9, was taken. This drawing was copied from a painting on glass, in the possession of the King : it corresponds with the mode practised in Siam, as described in a book, intituled, “ A “ Relation of the Voyage to Siam, “ performed by six Jesuits in the “ year 1685 ;” in which the following passage occurs: “ The “ huntsmen, who were mount“ ed on tame elephants, threw “ their nooses so exactly in the “ place where the elephants set

“ their foot, that they never failed
“ of catching them.” This manner of securing these powerful animals, I imagine, is not commonly used in other countries of the East.

Several of the human figures bear a striking resemblance in feature to the originals, particularly the Sere-dogee, or Secretary of State, Vol. II. p. 343, and the man and woman of the Kayn tribe, Vol. III. p. 243: the dress and character, in all the figures, are extremely well preserved.

The kindness of Colonel Sir John Murray supplied me with the Code of Arracan Laws, from which the Birman Dherma Sastra is compiled. It should be observed, that all the various Law Tracts in use amongst the Hindoos, throughout Hindoostan, in its extensive signification, the region of Hindoos, whether sectaries of Boodh, or of Brahma, are but so many commentaries on the Law of Menu, the great and acknowledged founder of Hindoo jurisprudence, whose original work has been translated with much elegance by the late Sir William Jones.

The account of the city of Pegue, and the stupendous temple of Shoemadoo, has already appeared in the fifth volume of the Asiatic Researches, printed at Calcutta; I did not, however, conceive that it ought, on that account, to be omitted in a general description of the country. My official transactions are also inserted in the records of the Bengal government.

In the orthography of Birman words I have endeavoured to express, by appropriate letters, the sounds as they struck my own ear. At the same time it is proper to remark, that scarcely any two persons will apply the same English letters to the same Birman words: this variation, which extends to the writing of all eastern languages, and is not easily to be remedied, greatly discourages the English reader, and diminishes the pleasure of perusing books on the affairs of India. In the names of places I have in general followed the orthography of Mr. Wood, in his excellent Chart of the Irrawaddy, the great river of Ava.

In the prosecution of this work I have experienced so many acts of friendly attention, that were I to enumerate all the favours conferred on me, I should occupy more room than the limits of a Preface will allow. The patronage of the East-India Company is ever extended to those who can supply useful information on oriental topics, whilst the encouragement which I received from this munificent body was rendered doubly gratifying by the politeness of Mr. Inglis, then Chairman, and

Mr. Bosanquet, Deputy Chairman, of the Court of Directors. To the spontaneous assistance of men pre-eminently distinguished for science, my book owes its most valuable contents. Sir Joseph Banks selected and described the Plants; Mr. Dalrymple, as before mentioned, compiled the General Map; and Mr. Wilkins favoured me with the Shanscrit Alphabet, and pointed out the analogy of the languages. To these gentlemen my acknowledgments are particularly due, whilst, abstracted from a sense of personal obligation, it is a subject of pleasing reflection, that, in England, the man who fairly endeavours to communicate beneficial or curious information, can never fail, notwithstanding he may be a stranger, to obtain the disinterested aid of persons themselves amongst the most celebrated for learning, and who are the patrons of literature in others. It constitutes a part of the national character, of that native liberality, which may be traced under various shapes, and is manifested in different forms, through every gradation of society, and amidst every class of men, who have the happiness to boast a British birth-right.

I cannot quit the subject without offering my tribute of thanks to my noble friend, Lord Teign-mouth, with whom the mission to Ava originated : he selected me to execute the plans which he had formed ; and his approbation of my labours is numbered among the most flattering circumstances of my life.

THERE are no countries on the habitable globe, where the arts of civilized life are understood, of which we have so limited a knowledge, as of those that lie between the British possessions in India and the empire of China. Concerning India beyond the Ganges, scarcely more was known to the ancients, than that such a country did exist. Undeserved importance is oftentimes attributed to that which is imperfectly known; and hence we find, in the Map of Ptolemy, the terms Aurea Regio, Argentea Regio, and Aurea Chersonesus, bestowed on countries eastward of the Ganges, and on the Peninsula that divides the Bay of Bengal from the Magnus Sinus, or Gulph of Siam. But although no satisfactory information is to be obtained from writers of antiquity, respecting the population, produce, extent, or geographical position of those regions; yet it may be concluded, that, even at the remote era when Ptolemy compiled his chart, the ports of the Eastern Peninsula were the seats of commerce, and resorted to by foreign merchants; as that Author distinguishes places of note on the sea coast by the titles Emporia; but with what people trade was carried on, or in what commodities they trafficked, is not any where ascertained.

From this period, almost total darkness seems to have obscured India extra Gan- gem from the eyes of Europeans, until the enterprizing genius of Emanuel, at the close of the 15th century, opened a new world, and laid the foundation of general wealth to Europe, on the ruin of the Egyptian trade, and of the state of Venice. Early in the 16th century, the Portuguese made themselves masters of Malacca, and soon acquired influence among the neighbouring maritime states. To the writers of this nation, history is principally indebted for whatever information has been obtained of the eastern countries of India : but their narratives so abound in hyperbole, and they recount such extravagant stories, that credit must be denied to many of their assertions ; whilst, at the same time, their writings furnish some accurate traits of the genius and disposition of the people whom they describe. Even the accounts of Mendez de Pinto, the prince of fiction, although an intelligent traveller, will enable his readers to form an estimate of the importance and civilization of nations which, at a later period, have, by many, been erroneously considered as in a condition bordering on wild barbarity.

From the testimony of Portuguese historians it appears, that in the middle of the 16th century, four powerful states divided amongst them the regions that lie between the south-east province of British India, Yunan in China, and the Eastern Sea; their territories extended from Cassay and Assam*, on the N. W. as far south-eastward as the island of Junkseylon.

* There are some petty independent princes, whose lands intervene.

These nations were known to Europeans by the names of Arracan, Ava, Pegue, and Siam. Arracan, properly Yee-Kein, borders on the S. E. province of British India, and includes the sea coast, with what is called the Broken Islands, as far south as Cape Negrais*; Ava, the name of the ancient capital of the Birmans, has been usually accepted as the name of the country at large, which is Miamma. This empire is situated eastward of Arracan, from which it is divided by a ridge of lofty mountains, called by the natives Anou-pec-tou-miou, or the great western hilly country. On the N. W. it is separated from the kingdom of Cassay by the river Keen-duem; on the north, it is bounded by mountains and petty independent principalities, that lie contiguous to * See Hamilton's new Account of the East Indies.

Assam; on the north-east and east, it touches on China, and North Siam; on the south, its limits have so often varied, that it is difficult to ascertain them with any precision. The city of Prome*, or Pee, seems to be the original and natural boundary of the Birman empire, although conquest has since stretched its dominion several degrees farther south. Pegue, called by the natives Bagoo, is the country southward of Ava, which occupies the sea-coast as far as Martaban, properly Mondimaa; Prome was its northern frontier, and Siam adjoined on the east. The kingdom of Siam, or Shaan, comprehended as far south as Junkseylon, east to Cambodia and Laos, and north to Dzemee

* It is doubtful whether Prome, of right, belonged to Ava or Pegue; it was claimed by both, and often changed its possessor.

(probably the Chiamee of Loubere), and Yunan in China. This nation calls itself Tai, and is further distinguished by the appellations Tai-yay, or great Tai, and Tay-nay, or little Tai; their former capital was named Yoodia*, or Yoodra; by De Pinto, Oodia; whence the Siamese are frequently, by the Birmans, denominated Yoodras. These boundaries, however, may be considered rather as the claim of each state, than its actual possession: vicissitudes of victory and defeat alternately extended and contracted their dominions.

Pinto, and Faria de Souza, agree that the Birmans, though formerly subject to the king of Pegue, became afterwards masters of Ava, and caused a revolution in Pegue about the middle of the 16th century. Hamilton, a much more recent author, says, that the kingdom of the Birmans extended from "Maravi," probably Mergui, near Tenasserim, to the province of Yunan in China, about 800 miles from north to south, and 250 from east to west. The Portuguese assisted the Birmans in their wars against the Peguers, and, according to Pinto, performed prodigies of valour. The account of the capture of Martaban*, and of the treasures found therein, far exceeds the limits of belief.

* Speaking of the capture of Martaban, Pinto says, "During this siege, they of the city ate 3000 elephants; there were found 6000 pieces of artillery: as for gold, silver, precious stones, and jewels, that were found there, one truly knows not what they were, for those things are ordinarily concealed; wherefore it shall suffice me to say, that so much as the king of Bráma had of Chaimbainham's treasure, amounted to an hundred millions of gold." The account of the feast of Tinagoojoo is ludicrously extravagant.

The Portuguese continued to exercise an influence in the Birman and Pegue countries, and a still greater in Arracan, so long as they maintained an ascendancy over other European nations in the East ; but on the seizure of their settlements and abridgment of their dominions by the Dutch, the consequence that had been deservedly annexed to the Portuguese name sunk into insignificance ; and the Christian settlers degenerated into a contemptible race, distinguished only by their feebleness and vice. During the reign of Louis the XIVth several splendid attempts were made to propagate the doctrines of the church of Rome, and advance the interests of the French nation, in the kingdom of Siam. Concerning these expeditions, accounts* of unquestionable fidelity have been published ; little, however, is related of Ava and Pegue, with whom, the Abbé Choisy says, “the king of Siam was constantly at war.”

In the beginning of the 17th century, both the English and Dutch had obtained settlements in various quarters of the Birman dominions, which were afterwards forfeited by the misconduct of the latter ; and Europeans of all nations were banished from Ava. The English, many years subsequent to this expulsion, were reinstated in their factories at Syriam and Ava, where they appear to have traded, rather in the capacity of private merchants, than on the part of the India Company, in whose service they were not regularly enrolled. The Island of Negrais was likewise taken possession of by the English, and a survey made of it by one

Weldon, in the year 1687. On this island the government of Fort St. George established a settlement. Little benefit, however, seems to have been derived from the acquisition: the affairs of the India Company, and indeed of the nation, were in too precarious a state, in another quarter of Asia, to admit of sparing the supplies of men and money requisite for its effectual support.

The supremacy of the Birmanians over the Peguers continued throughout the last, and during the first forty years of the present century, when the Peguers in the provinces of Dalla, Martaban, Tongo, and Promé, revolted; a civil war ensued, which was prosecuted on both sides with savage ferocity. In the year 1744, the British factory at Syriam was destroyed by the contending parties, and the views of commerce were suspended by precautions of personal security. Success long continued doubtful: at length the Peguers, by the aid of arms procured from Europeans trading to their ports, and with the assistance of some renegade Dutch and native Portuguese, gained several victories over the Birmans, in the years 1750, and 1751. These advantages they pursued with so much vigour, that, early in the year 1752, the capital of Ava was invested. The Birmans, disheartened by repeated defeats, after a short siege, surrendered at discretion. Dweepdec, the last of a long line of Birman kings, was made prisoner with all his family, except two sons, who effected their escape to the Siamese; from whom they found a friendly reception, and were flattered with assurances of security and succour.

Bonna Della, or Beinga Della, king of Pegue, when he had completed the conquest of Ava, returned to his own country, leaving his brother Apporaza to govern the late capital of the Birman king, whom he carried with him a prisoner to Pegue; enjoining his brother to reduce the refractory, displace suspected persons, and exact an oath of allegiance from such Birmans as should be suffered to retain their former possessions.

Matters at first bore the appearance of tranquillity and submission: the landholders and principal inhabitants of the country around Ava, acknowledged themselves vassals of the conqueror, and accepted the prescribed oath. Alompra, a Birman of low extraction, then known by the humble name of Aumdzea*, was continued by the conqueror in the chiefship of Monchaboo, at that time an inconsiderable village, about 12 miles from the river, west of Kcoum-meoum. This man, who possessed a spirit of enterprize and boldness equal to the most arduous undertakings, at first, like many others, dissembled the reluctance he felt at the imposition of a foreign yoke, and submitted to the necessity of fortune ; but, unlike others, he harboured hopes of emancipation, and meditated on the best means of accomplishing his future purpose.

Soon after the Pegue king had reached his capital, he caused a general proclamation to be issued, in terms of insolent triumph, announcing to all nations of the earth, that the Birman king was become his prisoner ; that the Birman country, being subdued by the prowess of his arms, was annexed, as a conquered province, to the Pegue monarchy, and that the city of Pegue was in future to be considered as the general metropolis. This proclamation, as might be expected, increased the hatred of the Birmans, and stimulated their desire of revenge. Alompra had at this time, in the town and neighbourhood of Monchaboo, 100 devoted followers, on whose courage and fidelity he could safely rely; he had strengthened and repaired the stockade that surrounded the town*, without awaking any suspicion in the minds of the Peguers, who never dreamt that a person so inconsiderable would attempt an act of rebellion under the check of a numerous garrison, distant only 15 leagues. Their attention was directed to remoter provinces; and occupied by the fears they entertained, lest the sons of Dweepdee should return in force to recover the possessions of their dethroned father.

* Almost all towns, and even villages, in the Birman country, are surrounded by a stockade, in like manner as the villages in the Carnatic are inclosed by a bound hedge: the Birmans are very expert in erecting this kind of defence.

Thus resting in imaginary security, there were not more than 50 Pegue soldiers in Monchaboo, who, on all occasions, treated the Birmans with contemptuous arrogance. Alompra, availing himself of the resentment excited by some particular act of indignity, roused his already well-prepared adherents to active resistance, and, attacking the Peguers with irresistible violence, put every man of that nation to the sword.

Alompra, after this act of open rebellion, still dissembling his real intention, and with a view to gain time, wrote to Apporaza in terms of the utmost humility, expressing much contrition for what had happened, representing it as a sudden gust of intemperate violence arising from mutual irritation; at the same time, lavishly professing his attachment and fidelity to the Pegue government. These assurances, though they could not be expected to procure an unconditional pardon, yet had the desired effect, of rendering the Pegue governor less alert in preparation to reduce him; and so far was Alompra from being considered in a formidable point of view, that Apporaza, having urgent business at Pegue, left Ava under the government of his nephew Dotachew, with directions to keep Alompra in strict confinement, as soon as he should be brought from Monchaboo, to which place a force, that was thought equal to the service, had been detached, on hearing of the massacre of the Peguers.

Approaching the fort of Monchaboo, the Peguers never dreamed of meeting resistance, and had come ill armed and equipped for encountering opposition; but they found the gates of the stockade shut against them, and heard threats of defiance, instead of supplications for clemency. Alompra did not give them leisure to recover from their surprise. At day-break the next morning he sallied forth at the head of his hundred adherents, and attacking the Peguers furiously with spears and swords, routed and pursued them for two miles. After this exploit he returned to his little fortress, and lost no time in preparing for a yet more hazardous contest : he represented to his people, that they must now resolve to conquer or perish ; and he invited the Birmanians of neighbouring towns to enrol themselves under his standard. Some obeyed the summons, but many were cautious of embracing his yet desperate fortune. In this affair, the number of Peguans defeated by Alompra is estimated at one thousand.

News of this disaster reaching Dotachew at Ava, he seems to have acted with the most blameable irresolution ; undecided what measure to adopt, whether to march in person at the head of his troops, which did not exceed three thousand, to wait until a reinforcement should arrive, or to retreat to Prome. Whilst he was thus deliberating, reports were daily received of some accession to the force of the adventurer, which, though in part true, were greatly exaggerated by the general consternation that prevailed throughout the city. Alompra had certain intelligence of the state of his interests in every quarter; and determined, by advancing boldly to Ava, to strike a decisive blow, before the fears of the enemy had subsided, and without giving time to recal the numerous detachments of Peguers that were scattered over the neighbouring provinces. The prudence and promptitude of this measure met with all the success it merited; Dotachew, when he heard of Alompra's intention, fled from Ava, whilst the Birmans in that city rose on the few Peguers that either could not, or did not choose to accompany their leader; all of whom they put to death. Alompra, finding that Dotachew had retreated, altered his first resolution of proceeding in person to Ava, and remained at Monchaboo, sending his second son, Shembuan, to take possession of the city, and garrison the fort.

These events appear to have taken place about the autumn of the year 1753 : Dotachew did not halt until he reached Pegue. The misfortunes of the Peguers in the remote provinces alarmed Beinga Della, their king, for the safety of his own territories, and particularly for the northern towns and districts of Prome, Keounzeik, Tambouterra, &c. where the Birmans considerably outnumbered the Peguers. A large force was, notwithstanding, collected at Syriam, the command of which was given to Apporaza, who, in the month of January 1754, sailed up the Irrawaddy, with a numerous fleet of war boats, to reduce the insurgents. At this time both the English and French nations had re-established their factories at Syriam, and, of course, had their separate interests. The French favoured the Peguers, whilst the English leaned to the Birmans: but until the vicinity of their residence again became the seat of war, neither engaged in open hostility: their partialities were manifested by petty assistance lent in secret, and supplies clandestinely conveyed, probably more with a view to private emolument, than from any enlarged political consideration.

When the English last took possession of Negrais, about the year 1751, their affairs were not conducted with prudence. A Mr. Hunter was appointed to the superintendance, who is represented as a man of capacity, but of an unconciliating and perverse disposition ; the settlement, under his guidance, continued in a state of unceasing ferment : the Caffre slaves, who had been introduced for the purpose of cultivating the lands, rose upon their masters, and, seizing on the boats belonging to the island, effected their escape. When Mr. Hunter died, he was succeeded by the person next in rank, under whose auspices the interests of the infant colony did not improve. In addition to their difficulties, the new settlers became unhealthy : these discouragements, however, did not induce them to evacuate the place ; but their exertions were rendered languid by the diminished probability of ultimate success.

The season when Apporaza undertook his expedition to reduce Alompra, was the most unfavourable for making a speedy journey. During the dry months of January, February, March, and April, the waters of the Irrawaddy subside into a stream that is barely navigable* ; frequent shoals and banks of sand retard boats of burthen, and a northerly wind invariably prevails. These obstructions, whilst they delayed the Peguers, gave opportunity to their enemies to collect the whole of their force, and arrange it in the most advantageous manner, to avert the impending danger.

The progress of Apporaza was uninter-

* The Ganges, at the same season of the year, experiences a like reduction of its waters. The head of the Hoogly river continues shut for some months, during which, boats, to reach the Ganges from Calcutta, are obliged to navigate through the Sunderbunds, and afterwards surmount the stream with difficulty, owing to the impediments of numerous shallows and sand-banks.

rupted until he approached the city of Ava, in the neighbourhood of which small parties of Birmans from the adjacent banks, molested the boats of the Peguers by desultory attacks; they, however, did not much impede the fleet, which continued to advance. Approaching the fort, a summons was sent from the Pegue general to Shembuan, with a promise to spare his life provided he immediately surrendered, and threatening exemplary vengeance should he refuse.

The fort of ancient Ava was of sufficient strength to maintain a protracted siege against an enemy inexpert in war; and Apporaza had good reason to suppose that resolution would not be wanting in the besieged. Shembuan replied, that he would defend his post to the last extremity.

In the meanwhile Alompra was unremitting in his preparations to receive the enemy; he had collected a considerable fleet at Kcoum-meoum, and his army was recruited to the computed number of ten thousand, whose confidence increased on the approach of danger; whilst, on the contrary, the troops of Apporaza were disheartened by the accounts of the valour and strength of their foes; the Pegue commander, therefore, judged it more prudent to lead them at once to battle, than to waste time in the operations of a siege, the termination of which seemed precarious and remote.

With this design he left Ava in his rear, and proceeded with his whole force towards Kcoum-meoum, where he found Alompra prepared to give him battle: an engagement ensued; the contest was chiefly confined to the fleets, whilst small parties of either army skirmished on shore. The action is said to have been obstinate and bloody : at length the Peguers, on a report being spread that Shembuan had left the fort of Ava, and was advancing to attack their rear, gave way, and fled with precipitation. Numbers were slaughtered in the retreat, and Shembuan, issuing from the fort of Ava, completed their overthrow ; Alompra pursued the fugitive Peguers as far as the city of Sembew-Ghewn, after which he returned to Monchaboo. Apporaza, with the remains of his army, retired to the province of Pegue.

The power of the Peguers now seemed hastening to its wane : yet, notwithstanding the recent check they had received, fresh preparations were made to prosecute the war. At this time, either real or pretended caution impelled them to a measure, not less repugnant to humanity than, as the event proved, injurious to their own interests. It was alleged, that a conspiracy had been formed against the Pegue government, by their aged prisoner, the dethroned monarch of the Birmans, which had been discovered when on the point of execution. All the principal men of the Birman nation were supposed to be confederated in the plot; and little formality was used to ascertain whether the accusation was true or false. On the 13th of October the Peguers rose, and, having first slain the unhappy monarch, slaughtered indiscriminately several hundred Birmans, sparing neither age nor sex. These sanguinary acts were as cruelly retaliated. The Birmans, though subdued, were still very numerous in the towns and districts of Prome, Keounzeik, Loonzay, and Denoobew. Exasperated at the murder of their monarch, and the fate of their brethren, they flew to arms, and, with a barbarity nothing inferior to that which had been exercised by the Peguers, exacted a severe retribution. Prome, Denoobew, Loonzay, &c. changed masters, and their garrisons fell the victims of revenge.

During these transactions, the Birman adventurer was sedulously employed in improving his good fortune. The eldest son of the late deposed and murdered king, hearing that Alompra had raised the standard of revolt, returned to Moncha-boo, and with a sect of brave and attached people, called Quois*, that inhabited an eastern province† of the empire, joined the fortunes of the adventurer. This young man, intoxicated by the successes of his party, had the imprudence to assume the distinctions of royalty, and attempt to exercise sovereign sway, as his hereditary right. Such claims, however, were wholly incompatible with the views of the ambitious chief, whose opposition soon convinced the prince, not only of the futility of his hopes, but likewise that, having harboured them, his own person was no longer secure; he therefore secretly withdrew, and again sought an asylum among the Siamese. This step so enraged Alompra, that, under pretence of a conspiracy, he caused near a thousand of the Quois to be put to death.

These events occupied the greater part of the year 1754, which was drawing to a close, when Beinga Della, having made fresh levies, marched from Pegue, accompanied by his brother, to retrieve the late disgraceful defeats. The king proceeded with all expedition towards Denoobew and Loonzay; the Birmans, on his approach, evacuated those towns and fled. The Peguers then advanced to Prome, a city well-defended by a solid wall, a deep fosse, and a strong stockade. In this fortress the Birmans prepared to make a resolute defence, and wrote to Alompra to acquaint him of their situation, entreating him at the same time to come to their aid with all possible dispatch. Beinga Della drove in the straggling Birmans that defended the banks of the river; a general assault followed, which was vigorously repulsed by the besieged; the Peguers then altered the mode of attack into a blockade; and, finding that the garrison could only act on the defensive, Beinga Della dispatched part of his fleet and army up the river, as far as Melloon, in order to cut off supplies from the northward, and afford his own people more convenient subsistence.

Alompra, although at this time threatened with an attack from the fugitive prince, and the exasperated Quois, on receiving intelligence of the blockade of Prome, immediately detached Meinlaw Tzezo*, an officer of distinction, with 36 war boats, to the assistance of the garrison. This general, notwithstanding his force was far inferior to that of the enemy, boldly engaged the advanced guard at Melloon, and drove them back to Prome; but, finding himself unequal to contend openly against the main body of the Peguers, he threw himself, by a skilful manœuvre, with a considerable supply of men and provisions, into the fort; a few of his boats only falling into the hands of the enemy, whilst the remainder effected their retreat to a place of security.

Forty days are said to have elapsed, without any material advantage on the part of the besiegers. The danger being past that threatened from the eastward, Alompra had, during this interval, collected the choicest of his troops, and, leaving the care of Monchaboo and Ava to his two eldest sons, proceeded down the river at the head of a formidable fleet, with a rapidity that equally tended to impress the enemy with dread, and inspire his own soldiers with confidence. The attack was not delayed beyond the hour of his arrival; the Peguers were quickly driven from a stockade which they had erected on the north side of the fort ; but the hottest action took place between the fleets : instead of an ineffectual fire from ill-directed musquetry, the boats closed, and the highest personal prowess was evinced on both sides ; knives, spears, and swords, were their weapons ; after a long and bloody contest, victory declared for the Birmans, whilst the vanquished Peguers sought safety in a precipitate flight.

Alompra, who never failed diligently to improve his advantages, suffered no time to elapse in inaction ; proceeding to Loonzay, he found the town evacuated, and, on taking possession, changed its name to Mayah-oun, signifying rapid conquest, by which it is at present known ; and such was the terror of his arms, that a body of his troops advanced within a few leagues of Persaim, or Bassien, unmolested by the enemy, who did not attempt even to retard their progress.

The report of this disaster spread general consternation throughout the Pegue dominions; the fugitives that escaped gave such accounts, as the facts, exaggerated by their fears, might be supposed to dictate; a general insurrection of all the Birman subjects subordinate to the Pegue government was apprehended; and certain information of plots and conspiracies proved that these fears were not groundless. The Pegue king, who had retreated to Bassien, left that place by night, and retired to Pegue; his adherents, thus abandoned and terrified, thought of nothing but their own security; every man pursued what he judged the safest track; and so universal was the panic, that, on the 17th of February, the town and fort of Persaim were completely deserted, the fugitives having first set fire to several houses, and consumed the public store-rooms, in which was deposited a large quantity of grain.

On the morning of the 23d, an advanced party of the Birman fleet came in sight ; shortly after, a body of about 250 men landed, and marched up to a small factory* occupied by the English. These people were well armed, according to the country manner ; but, not appearing to entertain hostile intentions against any except the Peguers, the English superintendent, Captain Baker, received them with confidence, and, in the character of a peaceable trader, solicited protection for the servants and property of the India Company: his request was granted; neither depredation nor insult were offered to the English. About noon the Birmans departed, having first set fire to what remained of the town, and destroyed part of the stockade; they directed their route back to Kioukhoun, a town situated on the mouth of that branch of the great river that leads to Bassien and Negrais.

From this time until the 12th of March, frequent skirmishes took place between small parties of the Birmans and Peguers, in which the latter were generally worsted; an ineffectual attempt was made to repossess and defend Bassien, by the late Chekey, or Lieutenant, the man who had been second in authority whilst the place was subject to the Pegue government.

The seat of war was now likely to be confined to the mouths of navigable rivers, and the numerous creeks and canals that intersect the lower provinces of Pegue, and communicate between the larger streams; a vessel of burthen, provided with guns, and worked by a few Europeans, became a formidable foe to the open war-boats of the natives, though well manned, and conducted with skill and courage. Alompra, who was at this time at Loonzay, or Mayah-oun, formed a right estimation of the advantage to be derived from an alliance with nations so well versed in the arts of maritime war; in order, therefore, to engage the good offices of the English, or at least stipulate for their neutrality, he sent a deputation to Mr. Brooke, resident at Negrais, and at that time chief of all the English factories.

On the 13th of March, a fleet of twenty-five Birman boats arrived at Bassien, having on board two Birman deputies, accompanied by an Armenian and a Musulman as interpreters. These personages brought a letter from Alompra, directed to Mr. Brooke, couched in terms of friendship ; but, not deeming it prudent to venture with so small a force through the Pegue districts to Negrais, the English superintendant undertook to forward a copy of the letter, whilst the deputies returned to a secure post up the river, at no great distance from Bassien, there to wait an answer, which was expected in four or five days, .

At the expiration of the computed time, the schooner, that had been dispatched to Negrais, returned, bringing an order from Mr. Brooke to Captain Baker, to accompany the deputies to Negrais, and to repair thither as speedily as possible : the deputation accordingly left Bassien on the 19th of March 1755, and reached Negrais on the 22d, at night.

The business of the deputies was not concluded until the 26th ; when, having received an answer to Alompra's letter, and their final dismissal, they departed, attended by Captain Baker. Approaching Bassien, they were astonished to find the place in the hands of the enemy. A detachment of 3000 Peguers, in 60 war-boats, had arrived during their absence ; and on the 26th, engaged and captured all the boats that waited to convoy the deputies to their master. Captain Baker, finding it impracticable to proceed, conducted the deputies back to Negrais, where they returned on the 3d of April, purposing to wait the occurrence of some more favourable opportunity.

The impediments that had thus prevented the return of the deputies were of short duration. On the 21st of April 1755, the Peguers received certain intelligence that Alompra had attacked Apporaza, in his camp at Synyangong, and that their countrymen had suffered a total defeat; their own numbers being greatly diminished by desertion, Bassien became no longer a place of safety; they judged it therefore most prudent to withdraw towards Syriam. On the 23d, the ruins of the town, and its vicinity, were completely evacuated, and the navigation of the river again opened to the Bir-mans.

The retreat of these troops was well timed; several detached parties of Birmans appeared on the subsequent days; and on the 28th, a body of 1000 men arrived at Bassien, a small number by land, the rest by water, with 40 war-boats; they experienced no resistance, and made a few prisoners. A strong convoy was sent down to Negrais to escort the deputies, who now pursued their journey without molestation; they returned on the 3d of June to Bassien, and left it on the 5th, with a letter from the resident at Negrais to Alompra, who had reached Dagon* early in the preceding month.

The victory gained by Alompra at Sy-nyangong, in the end of April, was decisive: the Peguers, disheartened, fled to * Now called Rangoon. Dagon is the name of a celebrated temple, a short distance from the present city.

Syriam ; and many did not halt until they reached Peguc. Among the latter was Apporaza, who left the defence of Syriam to a relation of the king of Pegue. The fortifications consisted of a feeble rampart, protected by a palisade, and an inconsiderable fosse, almost dry. Light as such obstacles would appear to regular troops, they presented a formidable opposition to the desultory attacks of an undisciplined rabble.

The French and English factories at Syriam were at this time in a state of rivalry, such as might be expected from the spirit of national emulation, and the avidity of traders on a narrow scale : the situation of both became at this juncture highly critical ; danger approached, from which they could not hope to be entirely exempt. It was not to be expected that they would be suffered to remain in neutral tranquillity, indifferent spectators of so serious a contest : it therefore became necessary to adopt some decided line of conduct, in order to avoid being considered as a common enemy, whilst the contending powers seemed equally anxious to attach them. In this difficult situation neither the French nor the English seem to have acted with policy or candour ; and the imprudence of certain individuals finally involved others, as well as themselves, in fatal consequences.

Monsieur Bourno, the chief of the French factory, in the interest of the Peguers, but apprehensive of the power, and dreading the success of the Birmans, had recourse to dissimulation, and endeavoured to steer a middle course. Under pretence of occupying a station where he could more effectually aid the Peguers, he embarked on board a French ship, and, with two other vessels belonging to his nation, dropped down from Syriam, and moored in the stream of the Rangoon river. Finding, soon after, that Alompra was likely to be victorious, he determined, if possible, to secure an interest in that quarter. With this intent, he quitted his ship, accompanied by two of his countrymen, and proceeded in a boat to Dagon, where Alompra received him with marks of distinction and kindness; but on the second day after the departure of Monsieur Bournon, the officer whom he left in charge of the ship during his absence, in concert with a missionary who had long resided at the factory, either impelled by fear, or prevailed upon by some secret influence, weighed anchor suddenly, and returned to the Peguers at Syriam, without permission from his commander, or even advising him of his intention.

So extraordinary a step surprised Alompra exceedingly; he taxed Bourno with deceit; the Frenchman protested his own innocence, and argued the improbability of his assenting to any such measure whilst he remained in the Birman camp. He sent an order to his officers to return immediately; an injunction that was disregarded by them, under plea of their commander being a prisoner. He then requested leave from Alompra to go in person, and bring back the ship; to this the king consented, on condition of leaving one of his attendants (Lavine, a youth) as an hostage for his certain return.

From the procedure of Mr. Brooke, resident at Negrais, in his reception of the Birman deputies, and the aid of military stores sent by him to the Birmans, the English, when it became necessary to avow the side they meant to espouse, seem to have declared explicitly for the Birmans; and this principle was adopted not only by the resident at Negrais, but also by the factory at Syriam. The Hunter schooner, belonging to the India Company, the Elizabeth, a country ship, commanded by Captain Swain, and two other vessels, left Syriam in the month of May, and joined the Birmans at Dagon. In the beginning of June, the Company's snow, Arcot, bound to Negrais, commanded by a Captain Jackson, and having on-board Mr. Whitchill, a gentleman in the service of the East India Company, proceeding to Negrais in an official capacity, put into the Rangoon river, through stress of weather. A boat that had been sent in to fetch a pilot returned, with an account of the state of affairs ; and brought a letter, and an invitation from Alompra to Captain Jackson, to carry his vessel up to Dagon, promising him every aid that the place afforded.

On the 6th of June the Arcot reached Dagon, and Mr. Whitehill went on shore to pay his respects to the Birman king, by whom he was received in a manner that gave no apparent cause for complaint.

After the defeat of the Peguers at Synyangong, and the acquisition of Dagon by Alompra, the English ships sailed from Syriam voluntarily, and came to Dagon to assist the Birmans, in conformity to the evident determination of Mr. Brooke, whose reception of the Birman deputies, together with his subsequent conduct, clearly evinced his friendly intentions towards that nation. Until the arrival of the Arcot, with Mr. Jackson and Mr. Whitehill, no subject of offence seems to have been given to the English by the Birmans.

A short time previous to the arrival of the Arcot, Apporaza returned from Pegue to Syriam, and reassumed the command; he had been made acquainted with the negotiation carrying on between Mr. Brooke at Negrais and the deputies of Alompra; and, in order to counteract its effects, commenced a secret correspondence with Captain Jackson. His arguments seem to have strongly influenced that gentleman, and given a decided bias in his favour. Ground of accusation was soon found against the Birmans; personal ill treatment was heavily complained of, which the tenour of Mr. Jackson's dispatches does not satisfactorily establish.

An attempt was shortly after made by the Peguers to surprise the Birman camp, and recover Dagon. Notwithstanding the land forces marched by night, and the fleet advanced with celerity, increased by a rapid tide, they were discovered in time for the Birmans to prepare for their reception. The boats first arriving, were repulsed by a heavy fire from the banks, which were lined with Birman troops. The post of Dagon could only be taken on the side of the land by a resolute assault. The attack of the Peguers was feeble and ineffectual; disheartened by the failure of their fleet, and destitute of able leaders, they soon abandoned their enterprize. An irregular fire of musquetry continued until noon, when the Peguers retreated to Syriam, little loss being sustained on either side.

During this spiritless contest the English maintained a perfect neutrality, not a shot being discharged from any of the ships; a circumstance that tended to create suspicion in the minds of the Birmanians: their distrust, however, seems to have been lulled by assurances of friendship, and probably by the expectation of a supply of cannon and stores from Negrais, which Mr. Brooke had announced his intention of sending under care of Messrs. Baker and North, whom he meant to depute to the Birman king. Alompra had, a short time before, left Dagon to quell a disturbance in the northern provinces, caused by the Quois and Siamese; who, taking advantage of his absence, had invaded his country, and excited an insurrection of the inhabitants in favour of the fugitive son of the ancient monarch. The sudden appearance of the victorious chief disconcerted his enemies; he soon reduced the disobedient, and obliged the Siamese to retire within their own frontiers.

Previous to his departure from Dagon, Alompra laid the foundation of the town now so well known by the name of Rangoon, or Dzangoon, which signifies victory achieved. Here stood, in former days, a large and populous city, called in the Pali, or sacred language, Singounterra; the site of which Alompra diligently explored, and raised on its ruins the present flourishing sea-port of the Pegue dominions. Dagon, often called Shoe Dagon, or the golden Dagon, is a name peculiar to the temple; a noble edifice, three miles distant from the banks of the river. When Alompra left his camp, he appointed Meinla-Meingoun, an officer of approved reputation and valour, to command in his absence.

The clandestine negotiations between the English and Peguers appear to have been renewed after this action; several messages passed, in which a fresh attack on the Birmans was concerted, and the aid of the Company's ships promised to the Peguers, who were thus to be befriended by the whole European force, both French and English. Confiding in their new allies, and assured of victory, the war-boats of the Peguers, during the night, dropped down the Pegue river, and with the French ships moored in the stream of the Irrawaddy*, waiting the return of tide to carry them to Rangoon. Dawn of day discovered them to the Birmans, whose general immediately sent for the English gentlemen, to consult on the best means of defence. At this interview, the Birmans candidly acquainted Mr. Whitehill how ill satisfied they were with the conduct of the English commanders during the late action, and desired a promise of more active assistance on the present occasion : Mr. Whitehill replied, that without the Company's orders he was not authorized to commence hostilities on any nation ; but if the Peguers fired on the English ships, it would be considered as an act of aggression, and resented accordingly. How much it is to be lamented, that such prudent and equitable principles were not better observed ! the departure from them affixed a stain on the national honour, which the lapse of more than forty years has not been able to expunge.

The Pegue force was, on this occasion, highly formidable ; it consisted of two large French ships, and an armed snow belonging to the king of Pegue, with 200 Teilec, or war-boats. On the approach of this armament, the Birmans manifested their apprehensions, by repeating their entreaties to the English. Owing to the time of the tide, it was noon before the Pegue boats could advance. When within cannon shot, the French ships came to anchor, and opened their guns, whilst a brisk discharge of musquetry was poured from the Pegue boats on the Birman fleet, that, for the most part, had taken shelter in a creek, and were protected by the fire kept up from a grove of mangoo trees, on the banks of the river, in possession of the Birmans, around which they had raised temporary works, and erected a battery of a few pieces of ship cannon, which, from being ill-served, did little execution. At this juncture the English ships Hunter, Arcot, and Elizabeth, commenced a fire on the Birman fleet. Thus assailed by unexpected foes, the Birmans were obliged to abandon their boats, and take shelter in the grove. Had the Peguers improved the critical opportunity, and pursued their advantage with resolution, this action might have retrieved their declining interests, and restored to them possession of the lower provinces. In vain the Europeans persuaded them to attempt the capture of the Birman fleet; too timid to expose themselves to a close discharge of musquetry from the grove, they were contented with the eclat of having compelled the enemy to retreat from their boats, and the rest of the day was spent in distant random firing. During the night the English ships removed out of the reach of small arms, two men being killed on board the Arcot. The Peguers kept their situation for some days, during which much irregular skirmishing passed ; when, having exhausted their ammunition without advancing their cause, the Peguers thought fit to return to Syriam, accompanied by the English and French ships, leaving the Birmans in possession of the fortified grove, and the lines of the newly-projected town.

Apporaza, who held the chief command at Syriam, received the English with every mark of respect ; and, judging this a favourable opportunity to regain the alliance of their nation, he wrote to Mr.

Brooke at Negrais, inviting him to come in person to Syriam, and there settle terms of permanent connection. Mr. Brooke, in letters of a friendly tenour, excused himself from personal attendance, and requested that Mr. Whitehill might be suffered to proceed to his station at Negrais, and the Company's ships permitted to pursue their voyage to the same place; whither he ordered the several commanders immediately to repair. The compliance of Apporaza with this request demonstrated his ardent desire to recover the good will of the English. Mr. Whitehill left Syriam, escorted by 20 armed boats, and, proceeding through the rivers, reached Negrais on the 26th of August: the Hunter schooner sailed on the 26th of September following, the Arcot being delayed for some necessary repairs.

Whilst these matters were agitating at Dagon; Mr. Brooke was advancing his negotiations with Alompra; Captain Baker and Lieutenant North were delegated, with presents, and instructions, to conclude a treaty of amity and alliance with the Birman monarch.

It has been already mentioned, that Alompra was under the necessity of leaving his post at Dagon about the middle of June, in order to suppress an insurrection of his own subjects, and repel the Siamese: the object of his expedition was attained with little difficulty; and he had the additional satisfaction to learn, that his arms had been successful in Cassay, the inhabitants of which, taking advantage of the unsettled state of the empire, had thrown off their dependence. This country is separated from the kingdom of the Bir-mans on the north-west by the river Keen-duem, which, taking a south-east course, unites its waters with those of the Irrawaddy, a short way above the town of Sembew-ghewn. About the time that Alompra left Ava to relieve Prome, he detached a body of troops across the river, under the command of a distant relation, to chastize the Cassayers: these people had, for ages past, tasted the sweets of independence only at intervals, when the contests of the Birman and Pegue powers left them no leisure to enforce obedience. Thus accustomed to the yoke, though always ready for revolt, they were quickly reduced to submission; the prince, or rajah, who resided at Munnepoora, the capital of Cassay, sued for peace, which was concluded on terms advantageous to the Birmans; and, as is the custom, a young man and young woman of the kindred of the rajah were delivered as hostages for the due observance of the compact.

The English deputation proceeded in boats slowly up the river, which, at that season of the year, is swelled by mountain torrents, and the navigation rendered difficult by the rapidity of the stream. A short distance above Prome, they met a detachment, commanded by a Boomien, or general of rank, in its route to Dagon; it consisted of eighty boats, and 4000 troops, to reinforce the army acting against the Peguers. Captain Baker had an interview with the chief, who expressed sanguine hopes of reducing Syriam, and destroying the French ships that had assisted the Peguers.

The late extraordinary conduct of the English shipping at Dagon was no very favourable introduction to the delegates; nor did Captain Baker escape reproach for transactions in which he certainly had no share. To increase his embarrassment, he had the misfortune, the day after he parted with the detachment, to lose his colleague, Lieut. North, who died at ROUNG-YOOAH, of a dysentery and fever. Captain Baker afterwards pursued his voyage, accompanied only by the Birman. On the 8th of September he reached Ava, lately the metropolis of the empire. ALOMPRA, partial to the scene of his first success, had removed the seat of government to MONCHABOO, which he constituted his capital, and fixed on as the place of his future residence. At Ava Captain Baker was civilly entertained by the Governor; on the 12th he reached KEOUN-MEOUN, situated on the west bank of the Irrawaddy, and on the 16th received a summons to attend "the golden feet*." Leaving his boats, at noon the following day he proceeded by land to the royal presence; his reception was conducted with as much pomp and parade, as a king so recently elevated to his honours, and seated on a throne so imperfectly established, was capable of displaying. During this interview the new monarch, in his conversation, gave a striking instance of that intoxication which usually attends an unexpected and recent rise to power: yet his vain boastings were not accompanied by any mark of personal contempt or indignity to Captain Baker. He vaunted of his victories, and the extent of his empire, in a style of presumptuous vanity equal to the arrogance of Xerxes; he upbraided our national character in the affair of the shipping at Dagon, alleging that he had treated the English with kindness, which they repaid by perfidiously breaking the promise given to him on his departure from Dagon. To these reproaches Captain Baker could only reply by expressions of regret; and a solemn declaration, that Mr. Brooke, so far from having authorized, knew nothing of such proceedings. Alompra listened to his assurances with more complacency than could well be expected from a despot who had waded to a throne through the blood of his enemies.

At a second audience, a few days subsequent to the first, his Majesty dictated a letter, addressed to Mr. Brooke, in which he granted permission to the Company to establish factories at Dagon and Bassien ;

having determined on the total demolition of Syriam. Captain Baker made a further requisition of the Island of Negrais. Although this desire was not refused, the formal assignment was postponed, owing to a domestic misfortune, which gave the King much uneasiness; but as it was his Majesty's intention shortly to repair to Rangoon, to conduct in person the Pegue war, the completion of the grant was deferred to a future opportunity. Captain Baker, having obtained his dismissal, set out for Keoum-mcoum, and on the 29th of September embarked to return to Negrais.

Whilst friendship and union were thus likely to be established between the Birmanians and the settlement at Negrais, the Peguers hazarded another attempt on the Birman post at Dagon, and were again assisted by the Arcot, and two private English ships, which, it is probable, on this occasion might have acted, in some degree, under compulsory influence. Three English and one French ship, with 300 armed boats, constituted the Pegue force by water; and 10,000 men marched by land, to attack the heights at Dagon, and the fortified grove. The Birmans, with considerable ingenuity, constructed fire-rafts, consisting of a number of boats fastened together, and filled with combustible materials: these rafts were floated down a strong spring-tide to where the ships lay at anchor, and directed with such skill and effect, as to oblige them to slip their cables and get under weigh, the French ship narrowly escaping destruction. This manœuvre effectually removed the vessels for that tide, and prevented a co-operation with the land forces, who, thus deprived of the support on which they chiefly depended, made an ineffectual charge on the Birman works; they were easily repulsed, and, with the fleet and army, retreated to Syriam, whence they never dared to hazard another enterprize.

The affairs of the Peguers were in this desperate state when Alompra returned victorious from Ava: his presence animated his own army, and spread a heavier cloud over the unfortunate Taliens*. He immediately changed the plan of operation: instead of waiting at Dagon, in fortified posts, the attack of the Peguers, he, in turn, became the assailant, and leaving the great river, boldly advanced his boats to the mouth of the Syriam stream; thereby cutting off all communication with the sea, and the countries to the west of Rangoon. Apporaza about this time retired from Syriam to Pegue, leaving his former station to be maintained by the chief Woon, or Woongee, of the Pegue empire. Permission had previously been given to the English ships to depart with the Company's stores. Mons. Bourno, the French resident, continued at Syriam, where, having moored his vessel close to the factory, he prepared to defend himself. The tide in the Rangoon river rises to an uncommon height; the river of Pegue, or, as it is often called, of Syriam, being fed by the influx of the sea, through the Rangoon river, sinks at low ebb into an inconsiderable stream. The French ship, when the water retired, touched the ground, whilst the Birmans, profiting by her unmanageable state, during the recess of tide, brought gun-boats to bear in such a direction, as to annoy her without exposing themselves. This judicious mode of attack proved successful; the ship was quickly disabled, and Mons. Bournon, finding the post untenable, wrote a letter to Alompra, apologizing for his former conduct, and making fresh overtures of accommodation. The correspondence was either discovered or suspected by the Peguers, who suddenly removed Mons. Bournon and his adherents into the fort of Syriam, before the purposed negotiation had time to be completed.

Alompra immediately took possession of the evacuated factory and vessel; after which he seemed desirous of attaining his object of Syriam, rather by blockade and famine than by hostile approaches; without attempting to assault the place, he continued in its vicinity until the month of July 1756. By such apparent inactivity on the part of the Birmans, the garrison was lulled into fatal security: Alompra, seizing a favourable opportunity, crossed the ditch in the dead of night, carried the outworks without resistance, and soon made himself master of the fort. The commandant, and the greater part of the garrison, favoured by the darkness, escaped to Pegue; many, however, were slain, and all the Europeans were made prisoners.

It has already appeared to have been the determined policy of the French to espouse the cause of the Peguers; and had succours from Pondicherry arrived before the state of things became too desperate, affairs would probably have worn a different aspect, and the Peguers obtained such an addition to their strength, as would have enabled them to conclude a peace on advantageous terms. But assistance in war, to be effectual, must be timely; unless applied while the scales hang nearly even, it often comes too late, and is found, not only to be useless, but even productive of deeper disappointment. In the present case, the French brought those supplies, of which the Peguers had long buoyed themselves with hopes, at the unfortunate moment when the communication was cut off, when no relief could be conveyed to them, and all prospect of retrieving their disastrous fortunes had completely vanished.

Mons. Dupliex, Governor of Pondicherry, a man whose comprehensive mind perceived with clearness whatever could benefit his nation, at this juncture deeply engaged in the important contest that was ultimately to determine the sovereignty of the East, being aware of the consequence of maintaining an influence in Pegue, had, notwithstanding the exigencies of his own situation, equipped two ships, the Galathié and Diligent, vessels of force, well manned and armed, and sent them, with a supply of military stores, to the assistance of the Peguers. Shortly after leaving Pondicherry, they separated: the Galathié had a speedy passage; but owing to a fatal and frequent error of mistaking the mouth of the Sitang river, which is a few miles to the eastward, for that of Rangoon, she did not arrive at the bar until two days after Syriam had fallen into the hands of the Birmans. The boat sent by the French commander to bring down a pilot was immediately captured. Alompra, being apprized of the circumstance, ordered a pilot, in a country boat, to proceed to the Galathié, and compelled Bournó, who was then under rigorous confinement, to write to the Captain, encouraging him to proceed, and come up to Rangoon, assigning some frivolous excuse for the delay of the Galathié's boat, which he was given to expect would meet him on the way to town. The Captain imprudently became the dupe of this artifice; he weighed, and stood in with a strong flood tide, which in a few hours carried him to Rangoon, where the sudden seizure of his vessel prevented all possibility of retreat; the stores were brought on shore, and the consignments and papers proved that these supplies were meant for the assistance of the Peguers, and directed to Beinga Della, and his brother Apporaza. Alompra became so incensed, that he gave orders for the instant execution of Bournó, Martine, and the Captain and officers of the Galathié. This sanguinary mandate was obeyed with unrelenting promptitude ; a few seamen and Lascars alone escaped, and these were preserved, for no other purpose than to be rendered of use in the further prosecution of the war, and survived but to experience all the miseries of hopeless bondage.

The Diligent was more fortunate ; having separated from her consort, she met with adverse winds, and was obliged to bear away for the Nicobar Islands ; this delay prevented her reaching her intended port until six weeks subsequent to the disaster. The caution of the Captain saved him from suffering a similar fate ; he got intelligence of the massacre of his countrymen in time to retire, and carried back news of the failure of the expedition to Pondicherry, whence it was impossible to attempt the extension of further succour to the unhappy Peguers.

The rage of the conqueror was, on this occasion, exhausted on the French. Foreigners of other nations, who had been captured in Syriam, were treated less rigorously; some who incurred his displeasure, and had reason to dread its effects, were dismissed with admonitions, and suffered to depart. Among these were a few English, who had not been able to withdraw from Syriam, before it came into the enemy's possession.

The fall of Syriam seems to have determined the fate of the Peguers; cut off from communication with the western countries of Dalla and Bassien, deprived of the navigation of the Rangoon river and the Irrawaddy, and shut out from all foreign aid, their resources failed, and supplies by water could no longer reach them. The Bago Mioup, or Pegue river, extends a very short distance to the north north-east; the tide alone renders it navigable; where that influence fails, it degenerates into a streamlet which issues from a range of hills about forty miles above the city, remarkable only for their noisome and destructive atmosphere.

Notwithstanding these discouragements, the Peguers prepared to sustain a siege in their capital, which was in a better state of defence than is common in countries where the science of war is so imperfectly understood. Situated on an extensive plain, Pegue was surrounded with a high and solid wall, flanked by small towers, and strengthened on each face by demi-bastions, equidistant; a broad ditch contained about three feet depth of water; wells or reservoirs supplied the town; the stupendous pagoda of Shoemadoo, nearly central, built on an artificial eminence, and inclosed by a substantial wall of brick, served as a citadel, and afforded an enlarged view of the adjacent country. The extent, however, of the works, the troops necessary to defend them, and the number of inhabitants within the walls, operated to the disadvantage of the besieged, and aggravated the distresses they were shortly to endure.

As soon as the rainy season subsided, and the country, which between Pegue and Syriam is low and swampy, had emerged from the inundations of the monsoon, Alompra ordered his General, Meinla-Meingoung, to advance towards Pegue at the head of a body of troops.

A few days after he followed in person with his whole army; and in four marches they reached the vicinity of the city, through a country laid waste and depopulated. Circumvallation is a favourite practice of warfare with the Birmans, and famine a weapon on which they repose the greatest reliance. Alompra, preferring these to the hazard of a repulse, in an attempt to storm, invested Pegue with his army, and erected numerous stockades, at once to protect his own troops, and prevent communication with the country. Thus secured by his defences from surprise and sudden attack, fearless of any external enemy, and commanding the navigation of the river, he sat down in the month of January 1757, to wait the slow but certain effects of hunger and distress.

The fort of Pegue was occupied by the royal family and the principal nobles of the Talien nation. Among the highest in rank were Apporaza, brother of the king, Chouparea, his son-in-law and nephew, and Talabaan, a general who, on former occasions, had been distinguished by rendering his country signal services, and had raised himself by his valour to the first military honours of the state.

The Birmans, though superior in numbers, persevered in the passive system of reduction, and were not to be allured from the protection of their stockades. Two months thus elapsed in defensive inactivity. The consequences, however, were inevitable; want, and its sure concomitants, discontent and mutiny, began to rage within the walls. On this emergency the king summoned a council of all his family and chieftains: after expatiating on the straits to which they were reduced, and the hopelessness of relief, he declared his intention to sue for peace; and further, to propitiate the conqueror, he proposed sending to him his only unmarried daughter; as by such an act of homage alone he could expect to procure favourable terms. This proposal was listened to with sorrowful acquiescence by all but Talabaan, who is said to have cherished a secret passion for the maiden; for in this country, young women of the highest rank are not, after the manner of India, precluded from the sight and conversation of the other sex. The chief, with haughty indignation, reprobated the disgraceful sacrifice, inveighing against it in the sharpest terms; and concluded with an offer to sally forth at the head of six hundred chosen followers, and either raise the siege, and procure an honourable peace, or perish in the attempt ; provided, in the event of success, the King would promise to bestow on him his daughter, as the reward of valour.

Struck with the gallantry of this proposal, the King apparently assented, and the council broke up ; but Apporaza and the other chiefs, who long had beheld with jealousy the growing power and increasing fame of Talabaan, remonstrated against the measure, as an act still more derogatory to their monarch, than yielding his daughter as a peace-offering to a sovereign potentate. The King, by these persuasions, was prevailed upon to retract the conditions. Talabaan, irritated at his disappointment, took an opportunity of leaving the fort at midnight, and with a few resolute attendants forced his way in safety through the Birman camp: he afterwards crossed the Setang river, and marched to Mondimaa, or Martaban, where his family resided.

Two days after Talabaan had retired, the Pegue king, in pursuance of his first intention, wrote to Alompra, proposing peace on the terms which he had intimated to his council before the secession of his general. The Birman king readily accepted the offered pacification. A negotiation was opened, which terminated in an agreement, that the Pegue king should govern his country under the stipulation of doing homage to the Birman monarch; that the ancient boundary should be observed; and Prome, or Pee Miou, continue the frontier of the Pegue dominions to the north. A preliminary of these conditions was the surrender of the daughter of the Pegue monarch to the royal victor: Ap-poraza, her uncle, was appointed to convey her to the Birman camp, where they were received with music, feasting, and every demonstration of joy and amity.

Some days elapsed in festive ceremonies, during which both the besiegers and besieged had frequent and almost uninterrupted intercourse; the guards on both sides relaxed in their vigilance, and small parties of Birmans found their way into the city, whilst the Peguers visited the Birman camp without molestation or inquiry. Alompra, who, it appears, had little intention of adhering to the recent compact, privately introduced bodies of armed men, with directions to secrete themselves within the city, until their services should be required; arms and ammunition were also conveyed and lodged in places of concealment. Matters, however, were not managed with such circumspection as to prevent discovery; Chouparea, the king's nephew, received intimation of the meditated treachery: he instantly ordered the gates of the city to be closed, and having found out the repositories where the weapons were lodged, and detected many Birmans in disguise, he gave directions to put to death every man of that nation who should be found within the walls, and opened a fire upon such part of the Birman camp as was most exposed to the artillery of the fort.

Hostilities now recommenced with exasperated fury: Apporaza with his royal niece were detained in the Birman camp; the uncle under close confinement, whilst the lady was consigned to the guardians of the female apartments. The Peguers having gained no accession to their strength, and added little to their stores, during the short interval of tranquillity, were not in a better condition than before to resist the enemy. The Birmans observed the system of warfare which they at first adopted; so that in six weeks, famine had again reduced the garrison to a deplorable state of wretchedness and want; the most loathsome reptiles were eagerly sought after and devoured, and the clamours of the soldiers could no longer be appeased. A few secret hoards of grain were by chance discovered, and many more were suspected to exist; the crowd thronged tumultuously round the quarters of Chou-para, on whom, after the secession of Talabaan, and the imprisonment of Ap-poraza, the care of defending the fortress entirely devolved. In order to silence and satisfy those whom he could not restrain, he ordered a general search for grain, and granted permission to the soldiers forcibly to enter whatever houses fell under suspicion. This licence was diligently improved, and the house of a near relation of the king was discovered to contain more grain than either the present situation of affairs or his own wants could justify. The deposit was demanded, and as resolutely refused. The crowd, authorized by the permission of Chouparea, proceeded to take by violence what was not to be obtained by entreaty; a riot ensued, in which some lives were lost, and the prince was at length obliged to abandon his house. Repairing to the royal residence, he uttered violent invectives against Chouparea, whom he accused to the king of harbouring an intention to deprive his sovereign of life, and seize upon the imperial throne; and advised his majesty rather to throw himself on the generosity of the besiegers, and obtain the best terms practicable, than hazard the danger to which his person and kingdom were exposed from the perfidy of a faithless and powerful subject. The king, whose imbecility seems to have equalled his ill fortune, lent an ear to the complaints of a man stimulated by sudden rage and personal jealousy : the unhappy and distracted monarch resolved to pursue his counsel ; but being too timid openly to avow his weakness and suspicion, he sent secret proposals to Alompra to surrender the city to him, stipulating for life alone, and leaving the rest to the discretion of the conqueror. According to the plan agreed on, the Birmans advanced to the gates, which were immediately deserted : the Peguers fled in the utmost panic ; many escaped in the confusion ;

the Pegue king was made prisoner, and the city given up to indiscriminate plunder.

Alompra, having thus triumphed over his natural enemy, and to all appearance given a final blow to the Peguers, who, with their city, and their sovereign, lost the spirit of resistance, proceeded to bring into subjection the countries to the eastward, including the fertile districts situate between Pegue and the Three Pagodas; which were the ancient boundaries of the Pegue and Siam, or Yoodra, territories. Talabaan had fled to Martaban, where his influence was still considerable, and his enterprizing spirit rendered him an enemy not to be despised. This chief, on the approach of Alompra, finding that he had not force sufficient to oppose the Birmans, fled into the woods, leaving behind him some of his family, and many persons who were attached to his cause. Alompra seized on these, and, conformably to the barbarous custom of nations of the East, the innocent were condemned to suffer for the guilty: the unfortunate Talabaan was summoned to surrender, and menaces of destruction, in case of refusal, were held out against such of his family and adherents as had fallen into the conqueror's power. The danger to which his dearest connections thus became exposed, suppressed in Talabaan's mind all personal apprehension; he surrendered himself a voluntary prisoner, to preserve those whom he loved more than life. When brought into the royal presence, with unshaken but respectful resolution, he demanded the release of his friends, and his own sentence. Alompra, struck with such an instance of magnanimity, generously forgave him, and ordered the captives to be liberated. He afterwards raised Talabaan to a distinguished station in his own service; the duties of which that general executed during the reign of Alompra with strict fidelity, although he was afterwards instrumental in exciting a rebellion against his successor.

The English interests in India were at this time suspended in a doubtful scale; little could be spared from the coast of Coromandel, then the theatre of most important struggles, to aid distant colonies, and support precarious projects; Negrais was in consequence neglected, though not yet abandoned. The Talien or Pegue government, by the surrender of their capital, being now extinct, it became necessary for foreigners to conciliate the new sovereign. Alompra had summoned Mr.

Newton*, resident on the part of the East India Company at Negrais, to attend him at Prome. Mr. Newton deputed Ensign Lyster to the Birman chief, with presents, and instructions to obtain for the Company the settlement of Negrais, with certain immunities and privileges of trade.

In pursuance of his orders, Ensign Lyster left Negrais on the 27th day of June 1757, and proceeded in the Mary schooner as far as Persaim, or Bassien, where he was detained until the 13th of July, waiting for a person named Antonio, a native descendant of a Portugucze fa-

* Mr. Brooke had retired : and Captain Howe, who succeeded Mr. Brooke, had died. Mr. Newton was only eventual resident. A Mr. W. Roberts was intended for that charge. mily, who was employed by the Birman government in the capacity of interpreter, and in consequence of that office possessed some share of power and influence. This man was charged with the provision of boats, and the safe conduct of the deputation. Matters being at length in readiness, Ensign Lyster with his attendants embarked on board four boats, ill equipped against the tempestuous and rainy weather which prevailed at that season of the year. Nearly at the same time, accounts reached Alompra, that symptoms of disaffection had again been manifested by the Cassayers, on the west bank of the Keen-Dnem. Leaving the command of Rangoon, now considered the capital of the Pegue province, to a general named Namdeoda, with a respectable force to check the Peguers, he departed from Rangoon in the middle of July. On the 23d,

Ensign Lyster, who had suffered great inconvenience from the want of a commodious boat at this stormy season, met the king on his way up the river, and was honoured with an audience on board the royal barge: at which, though from circumstances, little pomp of royalty could be displayed, yet his majesty assumed a lofty tone, boasted of his invincible prowess, and enumerated the royal captives of the Pegue family, who were led prisoners in his train. After asking several questions, he postponed the further discussion of business to a future day, and directed Ensign Lyster to follow him. On the 29th the King halted at Loonzay, where the English deputy was honoured with a second admission to the royal presence. At this conversation Alompra upbraided Ensign Lyster with the conduct of his countrymen, in giving encouragement and protection to the disaffected Peguers. Having ordered presents of a trivial value to be presented, in return for those brought from Negrais, he referred the deputy to Antonio, and the Birman governor of Persaim, for a ratification and final adjustment of the treaty. Being pressed in point of time, the king departed from Loonzay on the following morning, and left the delegate of the English factory to complete his mission with the Portuguese shawbunder*, and the governor of the province.

After some unnecessary delay, said to be occasioned by the fraud and avarice of the governor of Persaim, or more probably of Antonio the interpreter, an instrument was formally executed, consisting of nine distinct articles. Some valuable commercial immunities were by these ceded to the India Company, the island of Negrais was granted to them in perpetuity, together with a piece of ground opposite to the old town of Persaim, for the purpose of erecting a factory: in return for which, the Company engaged to pay an annual tribute, consisting of ordnance and military stores. A particular clause specified, that aid should be given to the Birmans against the king of Tavoy*.

This agreement, the conduct and completion of which seem to have been influenced by the undignified application of a bribe to the intermediate agents, appears to have received the entire sanction and authority of the king. Negrais, in conformity with the tenor of the compact, was continued in the possession of the English; and on the 22d of August 1757, Ensign Lyster measured the allotted portion of ground, on which the British colours were hoisted, and three vollies of small arms fired, to solemnize the act of occupancy.

* Tavoy, now in possession of the Birmans, seems to have once been an independent principality, and was recognised as such by the English in the year 1753. It probably owed its transitory independence to the wars that raged between the greater powers.

Elated with success, Alompra returned to Monchaboo, now the seat of imperial government. After some months spent in enacting laws, and regulating the internal police of the kingdom, he took up arms against the Cassayers, and, proceeding up the Keen-Duem with a fleet of boats, laid waste the western bank, burning villages, and capturing such of the inhabitants as could not save themselves by flight. Having landed his troops, he was preparing to advance to Munnepoora, the capital of Cassay, when information arrived that the Peguers had revolted, and, in their attempts to throw off the yoke, had defeated Namdeoda, and met with such success as threatened the loss of those territories which his valour had lately acquired. This intelligence induced him to abandon his views to the westward of the Keen-Duem, and return expeditiously to the southern provinces.

It was supposed by the Birmans, and perhaps not without good grounds, that this insurrection of the Peguers, after the departure of Alomptra, sprung not less from the instigation of others, than from their own natural desire of emancipation.

Crowds of fugitives had fled from the fury of the Birmans, and taken shelter in the Siam country; some had settled on the east borders of the Sitang river; others found an asylum in the province of Martaban; and many wandered, with their families and flocks, over uncultivated plains, and through deep forests, without any fixed abode, or other preference of a place, than as it afforded them protection from their persecutors, and pasturage for their cattle.

The absence of Alompra was deemed a favourable juncture to make the attempt, and the Siamese were not unlikely to encourage the undertaking. The Peguers in the neighbourhood of Dalla and Rangoon rose suddenly, massacred many of the Birmans, and, engaging Namdeoda, beat him in a pitched battle. This general after his defeat fled to Henzada, whilst Rangoon, Dalla, and Syriam again experienced a temporary change of masters.

Nor were the English at Negrais exempt from suspicion of being instrumental in bringing about this insurrection; no acts of publicity, however, have, on any occasion, been established against them: love of gain might have prompted individuals privately to sell arms and ammunition to the Peguers; and these transactions, if such did take place, were probably represented to the Birman monarch as instances of national perfidy, and the English described as a people hostile to his government, and conspiring to effect its overthrow.

The news of Alompra's approach dissipated this transient gleam of success;

Namdeoda, reinforced by troops and supplies from the northward, collected his followers at Henzada, and marched towards Rangoon. The army of the Peguers was encamped a little above the city, and their boats were drawn up to defend the stockade on the side of the river. An irregular but severe engagement ensued, which terminated in the overthrow of the Peguers: the Birmans again obtained possession of the city of Rangoon; Dalla and Syriam fell in course; and the arrival of Alompra, soon after, finally crushed an insurrection which at first was attended with formidable appearances.

About this time Mr. Whitehill, whose conduct on former occasions had given so much umbrage to the Birman chief, either supposing that the transactions were forgotten, or that he should be able to justify the part he had acted, revisited Rangoon in a small vessel laden with such commodities as were suited to the market. Whatever might have been the motives of his return, he was mistaken in the consequences. Alompra, being apprised of his arrival, ordered the vessel to be seized, and Mr. Whitchill made prisoner. He was sent up in close confinement to Prome, where he met the King returning from Monchaboo: the despot on this occasion displayed unexpected moderation; he spared the life of his prisoner, but compelled him to pay a heavy ransom; his property also was confiscated, together with the vessel that conveyed him. Some time afterwards he was permitted to depart in a Dutch ship.

The affairs of the British government in India were by no means in such a state of prosperity, as to allow of sending the supplies that were necessary for the effectual support of the settlement at Negrais. Every nerve was on the stretch to maintain, in the Carnatic, the claims of Mahommed Ally against the French; it was therefore deemed expedient, for the present, to withdraw the settlers from Negrais. Captain Newton was accordingly recalled, and reached Bengal on the 14th of May 1759, with thirty-five Europeans, and seventy natives; having left a few persons to take care of the teak-timbers, and materials for ship-building, that could not conveniently be removed, and to preserve the right of possession, in case it should be determined at any future period to re-establish the settlement.

The tragical catastrophe that followed, presents us with an instance of the sanguinary and cruel disposition that jealousy inspires, when rival interests are to be maintained by the arts of policy and fraud, rather than by open force of arms. The Armenians, the Jews of the East, a description of men subtle, faithless, and indefatigable, whose industry is usually seconded by a competent capacity, beheld with a malignant eye the progress of European colonies, threatening the annihilation of that influence which they had supported for a long series of years, in the administration both of the Pegue and Birman governments. Amongst these, Coja Pochas and Coja Gregory are represented to have been conspicuously active in their efforts to defeat the views and depreciate the credit of the English; the latter, in particular, who had obtained a considerable office, and carried some weight in the councils of Alompra, especially in what related to strangers, as soon as the affairs of the French were ruined beyond redemption, adopted the policy of attaching to him the few Frenchmen whom Alompra had spared, in order to render them instrumental to the destruction of the English, now the favoured nation. Laveene, the youth before mentioned as having been left at Dagon by Bourno an hostage for his fidelity, instead of falling the victim of retaliation, had been kindly treated by the conqueror, who, pleased with his appearance and vivacity, early promoted him to a commission in the guards that attended on his person. The young man is said to have imbibed the strongest prejudices of his nation against the English; and in him Coja Gregory found an apt instrument to execute his purposes.

Soon after the return of Captain Newton, with his party, the government of Bengal thought proper to send Mr. Southby to Negrais, to take care of the timbers and shipping materials collected there for the use of the Company, and to retain possession of the settlement. The Victoria snow, Alves master, was dispatched on this service, with orders to convey Mr. Southby to Negrais. During her passage the snow suffered severely from a violent gale of wind; on the 4th of October she anchored in the harbour of Negrais, in a very shattered and distressed condition: happily for her, the Shaftesbury East Indiaman was at this time in the harbour, having put into Negrais for the purpose of procuring a supply of provisions and water.

Mr. Southby disembarked on the evening of his arrival, and next day landed his baggage. Antonio, the interpreter, of whom mention has already been made, came down to Negrais to meet him, and, being a man of some official importance, was treated with civility and attention by Mr. Hope, at this time in the temporary charge of the settlement; as well as by Mr. Southby, the new resident. The pretext for the journey was, to deliver a letter to the English chief, from the King; this letter, however, was a forgery, to give plausibility to the visit, and afford an opportunity of carrying into execution the horrid plot with which he was entrusted.

The address and secrecy with which the intended massacre was concerted, gave no room for taking any precaution. Antonio, who had paid a visit to Mr. Southby on the morning of the 6th, was invited by him to dinner on the same day, at a temporary building belonging to the English. Whilst the entertainment was serving up, the treacherous guest withdrew. At that instant a number of armed Birmans rushed into the room, and put Messrs. Southby and Hope to death: this transaction took place in an upper apartment: Messrs. Robertson and Briggs happened to be below, with eight Europeans of inferior note; a separate attack was made on these by another set of assassins, in which five Europeans were slain; the rest, with Mr. Robertson and Mr. Briggs, shut themselves in a godown, or store-room, where they continued on the defensive until the afternoon, when, receiving a solemn assurance that their lives should be spared, they surrendered, and experienced the utmost brutality of treatment from the murderers. Mr. Briggs being wounded, and unable to move with the alertness required of him, was knocked down, and a period put to his sufferings, by having a spear run through his body ; the rest were escorted to the water side, where Antonio, who had retired when the massacre commenced, was waiting with a boat to receive them. This fellow had the humanity to unchain the prisoners, and pursued his journey with them to Dagon or Rangoon, where he expected to find the King, and doubtless to receive a reward for the meritorious part he had acted.

A midshipman, of the crew of the Shaftesbury, was about to enter the house when the slaughter commenced; but on hearing the cries of his countrymen, and perceiving the danger, he fled to the water side, wounded by a spear that was cast at him in his retreat. The Shaftesbury's pinnace brought away the midshipman, with several black people belonging to the settlement, the fury of the murderers being indiscriminately levelled against Europeans and their Indian attendants. The long boat also, that had brought on shore some of Mr. Southby's baggage, was fortunate enough to push off before the Birmans could get possession of her, and letting the ensign fly with the Union downwards, gave intimation to the ship, by that token, of some unexpected mischance.

The Birmans thus becoming masters of the fortified works, and having dispersed or put to death all the settlers, turned the guns of the battery, nine in number, against the Shaftesbury. In the performance of this service, Laveene, the Frenchman, was conspicuously active; indeed, the whole of this diabolic assassination seems to have been executed under his direction: it was afterwards ascertained, that when the English were surprised and overpowered by the Birmans, this man rushed into the works at the head of a body of banditti, and completed the slaughter. The precision with which the guns were pointed, sufficiently demonstrated that he who had the management was not deficient in the art of gunnery. The Shaftesbury returned the fire, but suffered considerably from that of the enemy; the second officer was killed, the running rigging damaged, and nine shots received between wind and water; many of the Birmans are said to have fallen by the fire from the ship; the action continued till dark, and was renewed next morning on the part of the enemy. The Shaftesbury, having unmoored in the night, weighed at day light, and dropped down with the ebb to the mouth of the harbour, where, beyond the range of shot, she rode secure: the Victoria snow followed her example.

On the 16th of October 1759, the Shaftesbury sailed, and the Victoria proceeded to Diamond island to procure water and ballast. Whilst they were at this place, a small vessel was perceived standing into the harbour of Negrais. Captain Alves humanely sent to warn her of the danger; but before the intelligence could reach her, she had cast anchor within the harbour. It does not however appear, that the Birmans had any intention of doing further mischief; they contented themselves with setting fire to the place, and abandoned it on the night that the vessel arrived. In a few days Captain Alves returned from Diamond island to Negrais; where venturing on shore, he was shocked at the sight of the unburied and mangled bodies of his unhappy countrymen. Amongst these he recognized the remains of Messrs. Southby, Hope, and Briggs; the bodies of near 100 natives, who had been attached to the settlement in various capacities, lay scattered around; the boats, buildings, gun-carriages, and every thing combustible, were consumed, except the teak-timbers belonging to the Company, which would not easily take fire, and were too heavy to be removed. Some Birman boats appearing in sight, Captain Alves thought it most prudent to depart; he accordingly weighed anchor, and leaving the shore that had proved so fatal to his friends, prosecuted his voyage to Bengal, where he arrived on the 10th of November 1759.

After so many proofs of a friendly disposition, the assurances given to Captain Baker, and the compact concluded with Ensign Lyster, it is reasonable to suppose, that some acts of hostility, not thoroughly explained, must have been committed, or that very plausible misrepresentations must have been used, to excite the Birman monarch to take such sanguinary revenge. That Gregory, the Armenian, was the principal instigator, is a fact of which no native of the country, who remembers the transaction, entertains the smallest doubt; as well as that Laveene was the principal agent and instrument of execution. It is said, that the former accused Mr. Hope, who commanded after the departure of Licutenant Newton, of having supplied the Peguers with provisions, and sold to them four or five hundred musquets; that he had taken pains to instil into his Majesty's mind, a persuasion that the English were a designing and dangerous people; who, having acquired Indian territory, first by fraud, and afterwards by violence, meditated the practice of similar treachery upon them: and only waited a fit opportunity to wrest from him his empire, and enslave his subjects, as they had recently done in the instance of the unsuspecting and abused Mogul. He also added, that the Governor of Negrais prevented vessels from going up to Bassien, by which the royal revenue was defrauded. These arguments, whether groundless or founded, were sufficiently plausible to produce the desired effect; and there is but too much reason to think that some provocation had been given, though perhaps of a trivial nature, and certainly not sufficient to warrant a step unjustifiable by every law human and divine.

When Alompra, after returning from the Cassay country, found his presence required in the southern provinces, he left his eldest son, Namdogee Praw, to govern Monchaboo during his absence. Attended by his second son, Shembuan Praw, and the female part of his family, he then proceeded on his expedition to Tavoy, a sea port on the eastern coast of the gulph of Martaban, which had been wrested from the Siamese by the Birmans. Many Peguers had taken refuge there from the persecution they experienced in the districts of Dalla, Rangoon, Pegue, and Tallowmiou. Encouraged by the first successes of the insurgents, and secretly instigated by the Siamese, the Birman commandant threw off his allegiance, and declared himself independent. Alompra sent a large detachment by land, under Meinla Raja, against Tavoy; and also a considerable maritime force to act in concert, commanded by Namdeoda. The previous defeat of the Peguers at Rangoon had tended to dishearten the rebels; when Meinla Raja had advanced as far as Killegoung, within one day's march of Tavoy, the Commandant came out in a supplicating form to meet him, and surrendered without any stipulation: he was afterwards put to death by order of Alompra.

After the junction of the forces under Meinla Raja and Namdeoda, Alompra sent his women, and the younger part of his family, back to Monchaboo, and, accompanied by Shembuan Praw, joined the army at Tavoy. Having now a formidable force collected and embodied, he determined to chastise the Siamese for the encouragement they had given to his rebellious subjects. He accused them of affording protection to delinquents and fugitives, and of secretly abetting the Peguers in all their hostile machinations against his authority. Under this plea he ordered the fleet to sail to Mergui, a sea port belonging to the Siamese, situated south of Tavoy, whilst the army advanced by land. Mergui, being ill fortified, was easily taken. Leaving a garrison for its defence, the Birmans marched against Tenasserem, a large and populous town, surrounded by a wall and stockade; notwithstanding which it made but a feeble resistance.

These conquests being achieved, Alompra determined to cross the peninsula, and carry the war into the heart of the enemy's country. After a very short halt at Tennasserem, he undertook an expedition against the capital of Siam. The enemy impeded his progress by harassing his troops, and endeavouring to distress him in his route, without venturing on a decisive action. A month elapsed before he reached the vicinity of the metropolis, which was well prepared to sustain a vigorous siege. Providence, however, interposed, and, by abridging the days of the conqueror, in all probability saved the Siamese from total destruction. Two days after the Birman army had erected their stockades, Alompra was taken ill of a disease, which in the event proved mortal; the natives call it Taungnaa, and describe it as a species of scrophula. On the first attack, Alompra foresaw that his end was drawing nigh. He gave orders for an immediate retreat, in the expectation of reaching his capital alive, and of being able to settle the succession, and adjust the affairs of his empire in such a manner as to avert the calamities of civil discord after his decease. On his return, he did not pursue the route by which he had advanced, but took a direct road by the way of Keintubbien, and the Three Pagodas, which are considered as the boundaries between the Yoodra (or Siam proper) and Birman countries. His intentions, however, were frustrated; the approaches of mortality were too rapid; he grew worse; and death overtook him within two days' march of Martaban, where he expired about the 15th of May 1760, and carried with him to the grave the regrets of his people, to whom he was justly endeared.

Considering the limited progress that the Birmans had yet made in arts that refine, and science that tends to expand the human mind, Alompra, whether viewed in the light of a politician, or a soldier, is undoubtedly entitled to respect. The wisdom of his councils secured what his valour had acquired: he was not more eager for conquest, than attentive to the improvement of his territories and the prosperity of his people; he issued a severe edict against gambling, and prohibited the use of spirituous liquors throughout his dominions; he reformed the rhooms, or courts of justice; he abridged the power of magistrates, and forbade them to decide at their private houses on criminal causes, or on property where the amount exceeded a specified sum; every process of importance was decided in public, and every decree registered. His reign was short, but vigorous; and had his life been prolonged, it is probable that his country would at this day have been farther advanced in national refinement and the liberal arts.

Alompra did not live to complete his fiftieth year: his person, strong and well proportioned, exceeded the middle size; his features were coarse, his complexion dark, and his countenance saturnine: and there was a dignity in his deportment that became his high station. In his temper, he is said to have been prone to anger; in revenge, implacable; and in punishing faults, remorseless and severe. The latter part of his character may perhaps have arisen, as much from the necessities of his situation, as from a disposition by nature cruel. He who acquires a throne by an act of individual boldness, is commonly obliged to maintain it by terror: the right of assumption is guarded with more jealousy than that of prescription. If we except the last act of severity towards the English settlers, his conduct on most occasions seemed to be marked by moderation and forbearance; even in that one disgraceful instance, he appeared to have been instigated by the persuasions of others, rather than by the dictates of a vindictive mind; and it is manifest, from the expressions of his successor on a public occasion, that it never was his intention to consign the innocent, with the supposed guilty, to the same indiscriminate and sanguinary fate.

Be the private character of Alampra what it may, his heroic actions give him an indisputable claim to no mean rank among the most distinguished personages in the page of history. His firmness emancipated a whole nation from servitude; and, inspired by his bravery, the oppressed, in their turn, subdued their oppressors. Like the deliverer of Sweden with his gallant band of Dalecarlians, he fought for that which experience tells us rouses the human breast above every other stimulant to deeds of daring valour. Private injuries, personal animosities, commercial emulation, wars of regal policy, are petty provocations, compared to that which animates the resentment of a people whose liberties are assailed, whose right to govern themselves is wrested from them, and who are forced to bend beneath the tyranny of a foreign yoke.

The decease of an eastern monarch commonly serves as a beacon to light up the flame of civil discord. The letter of the Birman law immutably vests the right of succession in the heirs male. Laws, however, in all countries, are made subservient to power. Neither the mandates of law, nor the claims of equity, can curb the career of restless ambition. Shembuan, the second son of the late king, who was with the army at the time of his father's demise, endeavoured to influence the troops in his favour. Having gained over a part, he issued a proclamation declaratory of his right to the throne, on the grounds, that Alompra had, on his death-bed, nominated him to be his successor. In this step he was premature, and his measures were ill concerted. The ardour of youth seems to have blinded the prince to the dictates of prudence, as well as to the duty and allegiance he owed his elder brother and lawful sovereign. He soon found that he had been deceived; that his followers were not firm in his interest; and that, even if they had been sincere, they were not sufficiently powerful to support his pretensions: he therefore hastened to repair his error by timely submission, which his brother, through the intercession of their mother, was prevailed on to accept. Shortly after, Shembuan was restored to favour, and no mention is made of his ever attempting a second time to disturb the government of his brother.

Namdogee Praw, although his brother's designs were frustrated, found in a less dignified subject a still more dangerous competitor. A rebellion that bore a serious aspect was planned and executed by a person of superior capacity. Meinla Raja, surnamed Nuttoon, a general high in the good graces of the deceased monarch, commanded the rear of the army that was returning from Siam. Nam-dogee had always harboured an enmity towards this man, who, sensible that he could expect no protection against the resentment of a vindictive despot, and possessing a considerable share of popularity, determined to contend for empire with his new sovereign. When certain intelligence arrived of the actual decease of Alompra, instead of proceeding to Rangoon, where boats were provided to transport the army up the Irrawaddy, he marched with the utmost expedition, at the head of the division of the army under his command, to Tongho, and took possession of that fort, which is accounted the strongest in the Birman empire. Encouraged by the alacrity with which the soldiers espoused his cause, and anxious to push his rising fortunes, he left a garrison in the fort, and advanced by forced marches towards the capital: as he approached his party strengthened, and the fortifications of Ava were surrendered to him without resistance.

Namdogee Praw was at this time at Monchaboo, making levies to oppose the insurgents. Affairs, however, were not yet in a state of sufficient forwardness to enable him to take the field, as he placed his chief reliance on the arrival of the loyal division of the army that had embarked, and were on the way from Rangoon; but the progress they made against a rapid stream was slow, in comparison to the celerity of a bold adventurer, whose success depended on his expedition and promptitude.

The distance from Rangoon to Monchaboo, by the Irrawaddy, is about 500 miles. In the months of June, July, and August, the river, which, in the hot and dry season, like the Ganges, winds over its sandy bed a slow and sluggish stream, as soon as the mountain torrents fall, swells over the summits of its banks, inundates the adjacent country, and rolls down an impetuous current, unchecked till it approaches the sea, and is repelled by the influence of the flowing tide. Such violence would be insurmountable, and must render the navigation of the river during this period impracticable, were it not counteracted by the strength of the south-west monsoon. Assisted by this wind, and cautiously keeping within the eddies of the banks, the Birman boats use their sails, and frequently make a more expeditious passage at this, than at any other season of the year.

The division of the army that embarked at Rangoon reached Chagaing, a large fortified town on the west bank of the Irrawaddy, opposite to Ava, shortly after the latter city had fallen into the hands of Nuttoon; whom the breadth of the river, and a want of boats, prevented from taking any effectual measures to oppose the junction of this detachment with the royal standard. Namdogee Praw, when advised of their approach, marched down from Monchaboo with the troops and boats that had been collected. Strengthened by this union, the King's force considerably exceeded that of the rebel general; especially as the numerous fleet that commanded the river not only secured the safe embarkation and landing of men and stores, but likewise cut off all supplies by that channel from the enemy. These disadvantages depressed the spirits of Nuttoon's adherents. A party of Namdogee Praw's forces having crossed the river, an irregular action took place, which ended so little in favour of the adventurer, that he threw himself into the fort of Ava, and, no longer able to keep the field, prepared to act a defensive part, relying on the arrival of succours from Siam, a quarter to which he had applied with earnest solicitation.

These occurrences occupied little more than two months, from the middle of May, the date of Alompra's decease, to the end of July; about which time the engagement happened that obliged Nuttoon to withdraw from the field, and seek security in the walls of Ava.

Whatever might have been their inclination, the English settlements of India were not, at this juncture, in circumstances to revenge the murder of their servants, and exact retribution for the insult offered to their flag. Perhaps, also, they were not ignorant that a discussion of the causes might only produce useless explanations: a conjecture that is in some degree corroborated, by there being no steps taken at any subsequent period, when the British superiority in Asia had crushed all rivalry, to vindicate the national honour, and chastise the perpetrators of the cruelty. Humanity, however, urged some interference in order to obtain the release of the few survivors, who, on the destruction of Negrais, had been carried into captivity. Policy also rendered it expedient to avoid an irreconcilable breach with the Birmans, as tending to give the French interests an ascendancy in that quarter, and enable them to gain a firmer footing in a country whose maritime advantages, and contiguity to our possessions, might afford them opportunities hereafter to disturb our tranquillity and molest our trade.

Captain Alves, who in the preceding year had conveyed Mr. Southby to Negrais, and brought back news of the fate of the settlers, was selected to return as the bearer of conciliatory letters and presents to the Birman monarch, from Mr. Holwell governor of Bengal, and Mr. Pigot governor of Madras. These letters appear to have been couched in terms of solicitation, rather than resentment; the liberation of the Englishmen that were carried into confinement, was the principal request; to which a desire was added, that the vessel and property belonging to Mr. Whitehill, confiscated by order of Alomptra, should be restored. Mr. Pigot's letter, however, went farther, and intimated expectation that the murderers of the English settlers should be brought to punishment; a requisition that was little attended to, and which the British government of India never manifested any inclination to enforce.

Pursuant to his instructions, Captain Alves sailed from Madras on the 10th of May 1760. Instead of proceeding direct to Negrais, he shaped his course to the island of Carnicobar, whence he sent a letter by a Dutch ship to Gregory the Armenian, who held the office of Shawbunder, or Ackawoon of Rangoon, informing him of his mission, and entreating his good offices with the Birman monarch, to procure the release of the English prisoners; at the same time conciliating him by a present of such articles as he conceived would be most acceptable.

On the 5th of June, Captain Alves reached Diamond Island, but declined entering the harbour of Negrais until he could ascertain the disposition of the natives towards the English, which, after the recent catastrophe, there was room to suspect. His doubts being removed, he sent an officer up to Persaim, with a letter to Antony, the Portuguese superintendent, who on receipt of it came down, as a mark of respect, to meet the English deputy, at a chokey or guard-house, near Negrais. Captain Alves, dissembling his knowledge of the part which Antony had acted in the late affair, received his visitor with apparent cordiality, whilst the other took no small pains to convince him that he was guiltless. After a short residence at Persaim, Captain Alves received a very friendly letter from Mungai-Narrataw, a relation of the royal family, and vested with the office of Maywoon or Viceroy of Pegue, inviting him to Rangoon ; desiring him at the same time to bring with him the presents intended for the King. This invitation Captain Alves thought it prudent to accept ; and on the 5th of August arrived at Rangoon, where he was received with sufficient politeness by the Viceroy, and made acquainted with the rebellion of Nuttoon, and the deranged state of public affairs at the capital.

Mr. Robertson, and the soldiers who had escaped the massacre at Negrais, were at Rangoon when Captain Alves arrived, and, though under restraint, were by no means treated with harshness. Captain Alves solicited their discharge from the Viceroy ; who, though he could not grant the request without special authority from the King, yet consented that Mr. Robertson should accompany Captain Alves back to Persaim : and added, that there was little doubt of procuring a general release. In the course of this communication, the Viceroy gave Captain Alves solemn assurances, that Gregory the Armenian, by his misrepresentations and artifice, was the principal instigator of the tragical scene at Negrais ; and that Laveene, who was in league with Gregory, was the person to whom the execution of the act had been committed ; intimating also, that he himself, through the intrigues of these men, had incurred the displeasure of the King, on account of his manifest attachment to the English nation.

Captain Alves continued at Rangoon

no longer than was necessary : he left it on the 9th of August, the Maywoon having previously received from him the presents intended for the Birman monarch. An officer belonging to the provincial court accompanied Captain Alves back to Persaim.

Captain Alves expecting to receive a summons to attend the golden feet, was making preparation for his journey, when Gregory the Armenian returned from Monchaboo, whither he had proceeded with all expedition on receipt of the letter which Captain Alves had written from Carnicobar. His zeal on this occasion was prompted by a desire to prevent, if possible, any amicable arrangement ; or, in case he should fail in that view, to make himself of personal consequence, from being the ostensible mediator and instrument of reconciliation.

On receiving intelligence of the expected arrival of an authorized agent from the British government, Namdogce-Praw directed Gregory to return to Persaim, and dispatched along with him a Birman officer as the bearer of an order to Captain Alves, commanding him to repair to the royal presence. In the translation which Gregory, as interpreter, delivered to Captain Alves, the crafty Armenian introduced passages favourable to himself, attributing the obtainment of any attention to his intercession: these interpolations were fabricated, as the imperial mandate did not even mention the name of Gregory.

The terms in which the royal order was expressed, encouraged Captain Alves to undertake the journey; he accordingly left Persaim on the 22d of August, ac-accompanied by Antonio the Portuguese, Gregory, and two Birman officers. The unsettled state of the country subjected him to several unpleasant interruptions; his boat, during the course of the voyage, was frequently searched, with the excuse of looking for contraband commodities, and many articles were carried away under various fraudulent pretences.

On the 22d of August, Captain Alves reached Chagaing, at that time the headquarters of the Birman king, who with a numerous army was besieging the rebel general in Ava; and on the 23d he was honoured with an audience, to deliver his credentials. The letters from the governors of Madras and Bengal were translated into the Persian, Portuguese, and Birman languages; and the different versions carefully collated. His majesty expressed his surprise that the Governor of Madras should demand satisfaction for consequences, which the misconduct of the Company's servants had drawn upon themselves; adding, that the disaster of Mr. Southby was an accident which could not be foreseen or guarded against: at the same time he used a forcible metaphor; “for,” says the Birman king*, “I suppose you have seen that in this country, in the wet season, there grows so much useless grass and weeds in the fields, that in dry weather we are forced to burn them to clear the ground: it sometimes happens that there are salubrious herbs amongst these noxious weeds and grass, which, as they cannot easily be distinguished, are indiscriminately consumed with the others; thus

“ it happened to be the new Governor’s
“ lot.” Compensation for Mr. Whitehill’s property that had been confiscated, and restitution of the vessel, were peremptorily refused, for the alleged reason, that Mr. Whitehill and the Governor of Negrais were the aggressors : but his majesty was pleased to agree, that the property of the East India Company should be restored. Having given an order for the release of all English subjects that were prisoners in his dominions, he desired that two of the most prudent should remain to take care of the timbers, and reside at Persaim, where he consented to give the Company a grant of as much ground as they might have occasion to occupy, under the stipulation that their chief settlement should be at Persaim, and not at Negrais. He assigned as a reason, that at Negrais they would be exposed to the depredations of the French, or any other nation with whom the English might be at war, without a possibility of his extending that protection to them that he wished ; but of which they could always have the full benefit at Persaim. In requital for these concessions, his majesty intimated his expectation of a regular supply of arms and ammunition from the English settlements, together with several other products of a useful nature ; to all which Capt. Alves prudently returned a conditional acquiescence.

During these conferences, explanations took place, which created at court suspicion of the fidelity of Gregory in his capacity of interpreter : a minute investigation lost him the confidence of his master, and had nearly caused the forfeit of his life. His disgrace was sudden, public, and ignominious.

On the 27th of September, Captain Alves attended in company with the great officers of state and the principal nobility, to pay his respects at the golden feet, as is the custom on the annual feast of Sand-anguite. On this day the King desired Captain Alves to request whatever mark of favour he thought proper, with an assurance that it should be granted to him. The freedom of all the English subjects having been already procured, Captain Alves humanely entreated the emancipation of three Dutchmen, who had been captured by Alompra during his expedition to the Siam country. In compliance with his desire, an order was immediately issued for their release.

The distracted and critical state of public affairs necessarily weakened the hand of power, and diminished the authority of the King. That rigid severity of police which characterizes the Birman government became relaxed, and illicit exactions were imposed and levied by inferior officers, with little dread of punishment. Captain Alves experienced in his own person the inconvenience which an individual, at such a juncture, may expect to suffer. Under frivolous pretences, his final dismissal was protracted, nor could he procure the promised answers to the letters of the Governor of Bengal and Madras, until he had paid fees to certain officers of government, who took advantage of the times to extort unauthorized emoluments. After suffering much vexatious imposition, he at length, on the 10th of October, received in form the long expected documents, and on the same evening left Chagging to proceed to Persaim, accompanied by Antonio. The mandate for liberating the English prisoners was punctually obeyed: there were five in number, two of whom, Messrs. Robertson and Helass, Captain Alves, conformably to the promise made to the Birman king, left at Persaim, to take care of the property belonging to the India Company. On the 1st of November he arrived at Rangoon, where he was received with kindness and hospitality by Mungai-Narrataw, the Viceroy. On the 4th he took leave of his host, and on the 14th got to Persaim, where he again embarked, and, sailing from Negrais, reached Calcutta a few days before the expiration of the year.

In the mean while the siege of Ava was carried on with vigour, and the assailants were resolutely resisted. The royal army, computed at 100,000 men, advanced their stockades within fifty yards of the ditch. The batteries, consisting of a few old nine and six pounders, casually procured from shipping at the ports, made little impression on the walls, which were unprovided with artillery, but of an uncommon thickness, being composed of earth and loose stones, supported by a well built face of brick and mortar. The water in the ditch, which during the rains is full, had subsided so low as to become fordable in several places; the besiegers made repeated attempts to carry the place by storm, but were repulsed at every onset. In these attacks many lives were lost. The rebels, knowing that sure destruction awaited those who should be taken, defended themselves obstinately; capitulation was not thought of: whenever the enemy advanced with intent to escalate the works, they poured on them melted lead, boiling petroleum, and hot pitch, whilst a brisk fire of musquetry annoyed them at a distance. The siege was thus protracted for seven months, Nuttoon still cherishing sanguine hopes of succour from the government of Siam.

These expectations were not realized. Supplies from the country failed, and want began to make ravages within the walls, although the magazines, which at the commencement of the siege were full, had been husbanded with the utmost economy. Discontent is ever the concomitant of distress. The Governor of Mayah Oun, who had embraced Nuttoon's fortune, deserted from the fort. Flying to Mayah Oun, he collected his adherents; but not being able to resist the royal forces, they set fire to the town, and betook themselves to the woods and jungles, whence they afterwards withdrew to the Eastern provinces, where the authority of the Birman monarch was yet scarcely acknowledged. The rebels had likewise evacuated the fort of Tongho. Towards the end of the year, the garrison in Ava was reduced to the greatest extremity, and their numbers diminished above one half by sickness, famine, and desertion. In this helpless state, without any chance of relief, Nuttoon made his escape from the fort in disguise; but had proceeded only the distance of two days' journey, when he was discovered by some peasants, and brought back in fetters. The fort of Ava fell shortly after the flight of its commandant. Such of his unfortunate adherents as could not effect their escape, were without mercy put to death. Nuttoon likewise suffered the doom of a traitor.

The destruction of Nuttoon did not put an end to the disturbances that agitated the Birman empire. A younger brother of Alompra, uncle to Namdogee-Praw, who had recently been appointed Viceroy of Tongho, aspired to independence, and refused to pay homage to his brother's son. Whilst measures were taking to reduce him, he suddenly detached a body of troops, under a general named Bala-meing-tein, who surprised the fort of Prome; but the Chekey or Lieutenant of Shoc-dong-northa soon after assembled a respectable force, and compelled Bala-meing-tein to abandon his conquest. Namdogee-Praw raised an army, and, accompanied by his brother Shembuan, marched in person to Tongho to punish the contumacy of his rebellious relation, who, not daring to risk an open action, shut himself within the walls of Tongho. After a siege of three months, the garrison surrendered. Several of the ringleaders were punished with death; mercy, however, was extended to the rebellious uncle. The King spared his life, but during the rest of his reign kept him a close prisoner in the fort of Ava.

The appointment of a new Viceroy, and the arrangements necessary to the restoration of good order in these provinces, next occupied the attention of the King. This task being accomplished, he returned with his brother to Monchaboo, from whence he soon after removed the seat of imperial government to the city of Chagaing, the situation of which, equally convenient and salubrious, enjoying a pure air, and surrounded by the most picturesque scenery of nature, had delighted the King during his late residence, whilst directing the operations against

Ava. The three succeeding years of his reign were employed in reducing the refractory to obedience, and establishing the royal authority on a firmer basis. Amongst the turbulent was Talabaan, the Pegue chieftain, who had formerly experienced the clemency of Alompra: this man, after he had been received into favour, was sent by the conqueror to the Martaban province, the residence of his family and friends, invested with an office of dignity. So long as that monarch lived, he conducted himself like a dutiful servant: the death of his sovereign, however, cancelled in Talabaan's breast the bonds of duty and gratitude; and, though faithful to the father, he took the earliest opportunity to revolt against the son. On this occasion, he seems to have lost his prudence with his principles. His rebellion was feeble, and easily subdued;

he was made prisoner, and at last suffered that death which he had before so narrowly escaped. The Peguers at Sitang, a very numerous body, likewise revolted, but were suppressed by the activity of the Viceroy of Pegue, without causing any serious danger to the state. No foreign expedition was undertaken by Namdogee-Praw; indeed the internal situation of his empire hardly rendered such a project practicable: his reign was but of short duration, yet he is said to have diligently improved his time, and benefited his country as much as circumstances would admit. He died at his capital about the month of March 1761, of the same disease that brought his father to the grave, leaving behind him one son named Momien, yet an infant. Of the general character of Namdogee-Praw people speak favourably; bigotry is ascribed to him as his principal failing: he was inflexibly severe on those who transgressed against the tenets of religion, or omitted aught of the respect due to the Rhahaans, its ministers. He punished slight immoralities with the rigour due only to atrocious crimes; slaying animals for the purposes of food was strictly prohibited, and a second conviction of drunkenness incurred the inevitable penalty of death.

The imbecile minority of the legal heir to the throne gave his uncle Shembuan, who, as the nearest relation, became the natural guardian of the child, an opportunity to undermine the claims and to usurp the right of the son of his deceased brother. Shembuan, on the demise of Namdogee-Praw, assumed the reins of government with a strong hand; nor is it ascertained that he ever acknowledged holding them in trust for the minor. Whatever he might have done on the first assumption of regal power, he soon threw aside all disguise, and was proclaimed and acknowledged lawful sovereign of the Birman and Pegue nations.

Nor would Shembuan, who had thus unjustly deprived a nephew of his birth-right, have scrupled to secure a more firm possession of the throne by imbruing his hands in innocent blood, had not a sister of Alompra humanely interfered, and obtained charge of the child, under a promise that he should be educated in religious obscurity among the Rhahans, and never be in a situation to disturb the government of his uncle.

Thus freed from the dread of competition; Shembuan had leisure to follow the bent of his own disposition, which was by nature ardent and ambitious. His first undertaking was against the Siamese; assigning for the rupture the customary excuse, that certain delinquent subjects of the Birman government had received protection from them; and further, that Alompra, his father, had enjoined his children in his last moments to prosecute the war against the Siamese, which he had been prevented by death alone from bringing to a successful issue. Such were the pretences, and perhaps as well founded as pretences for war usually are. Two armies were embodied; one destined to invade North Siam, commanded by a general named Decbedee; the other proceeded to the southward by Sitang and Martaban, under the conduct of Mahanortha; whilst a fleet of small vessels, fitted out for the reduction of the maritime towns, was entrusted to Chedookaminee.

The equipment of these armaments was not completed until the commencement of the year 1765 : and their progress, after they were in readiness, was so slow, that nothing of importance could be effected during that year. In the beginning of the next, Decbedee over-ran the province of Zeme, whilst Chedookaminee with the fleet captured Tavoy ; which, though it had been reduced by Alompra, was too remote to be retained, and soon reverted to its former possessors. The detachment led by Mahanortha also penetrated to Tavoy by land ; and cantoned there during the rains. The forces of Decbedee passed the wet season on the borders of the Yoodra-country : these different parties were prepared to act in concert, and attempt the conquest of the Siamese capital.

Whilst matters were thus transacting in the south-east quarter, Shembuan marched in person against the Munipora Cassayers; who, taking advantage of the state of affairs, had thought fit to disclaim the yoke of foreigners, and refused to acknowledge the supremacy of the Birman monarch. This enterprize, however, appears to have been a predatory incursion, rather than an invasion with a view of permanent conquest. The stay that Shembuan made in the country did not exceed a month; he returned in obedience to more urgent calls, laden with the booty of the frontier towns, and accompanied by a numerous train of prisoners of every age and sex.

In the beginning of the year 1766, the southern armies commenced their operations against the Siamese. Deebedee entered the Yoodra country by the route of Taunglee and Mainhoot, afterward pursuing a more southerly direction, in order to effect a junction with Mahanortha, who moved from Tavoy in a corresponding time. Their union was resolutely disputed by the Siamese; and Deebedee's division suffered seriously during a march of fifteen days. Notwithstanding this resistance, a junction was effected; after which they advanced against Siam*, the enemy still continuing to harass them in their march, by irregular attacks and frequent skirmishes. Having at length penetrated as far as the banks of a river*, seven or eight days' journey from the fort, the Siamese tried the fortune of a general action; which terminating unfavourably, their army dispersed; part retreating to Siam, whilst the remainder either concealed themselves in the woods, or sought security in distant provinces. The consequence of this defeat was the immediate investiture of Siam by the Birmans. The fort†, by nature strong from its almost insulated situation, is represented to have been well built, according to the Eastern fashion, having a good ditch, protected by a strong rampart faced with masonry, and strengthened by equidistant towers.

* Probably what is called by the Birmans the Boom-agurry Meep.

† During the monsoon, the city of Siam is insulated.

The artillery on either side was of little use ; for though there were a few guns mounted, and some brought against the place, yet they neither contributed to the success of the attack, nor the security of the defence : passive blockade is the favourite system of Birman warfare.

The Birman army had been before the city two months, when Mahanortha died. As the officer of highest rank, he held the chief command, which, after his decease, devolved on Deebedee, who is represented as better qualified for the trust than his predecessor. In a short time after this event, the King of Siam, panic-struck and hopeless, secretly withdrew from the fort, in order to avoid falling into the hands of his enemies, and, eluding the Birman outposts, sought refuge among the hills. The Siamese, thus deserted by their leader, offered to capitulate; terms were proposed and accepted: a heavy mulct was imposed upon the inhabitants, the defences of the city were destroyed, and a Siamese governor appointed, who took an oath of allegiance to the Birman monarchy, and engaged to pay an annual tribute. Deebedee returned with his victorious army to the province of Martaban, enriched by the spoils of Dwara-wuddy.

Scarcely was the Siamese expedition drawn to a conclusion, when a new danger threatened from an opposite direction. The Chinese government, whose ambition is only exceeded by its pride and arrogance, had planned the subjugation of the Birman, intending to add the dominion of the Irrawaddy, and the fertile plains of Zomiem *, to their empire; already stretched beyond the limits to which any government can efficiently extend the force of restrictive authority. In the beginning of the year 1767, or 1131 of the Birman æra, the Governor of Quantong sent intimation to Shembuan, that an army of Chinese was advancing from the western frontiers of Yunan, and had already passed the mountains that skirt the Chinese and the Birman empires: this intelligence was scarcely communicated, when it was confirmed by the actual invasion. The Chinese forces, computed at 50,000 men, approached by unremitting marches. Leaving the province of Bomoo to the west, they penetrated by a town called Gouptoung, between which and Quan-

Meanwhile Shembuan appointed two separate armies: one, consisting of 10,000 infantry and 2000 cavalry, under the conduct of a general named Amioumee, took the direct road leading to Quantong, through the districts of La-be-nagoo, and Tagoung; the other army, of much greater force, was committed to Tengia Boo, a general of high rank and reputation. This latter was directed to make a circuitous march over hills that lay more to the southward, to endeavour, if possible, to get into the rear of the Chinese army, and prevent their retreat. The Governor of Quantong, named Ledougmee, finding that it was not the design of the Chinese leader to waste time by attacking his fort, collected a considerable body of men, and took the field, against the invaders. The division of Amiou-mee first met the enemy near a town called Peengee, where they encamped, within eight miles of the Chinese army; on the following day a partial action took place, in which the Birmans were worsted, and obliged to retreat to the southward of Peengee. The Chinese, animated by this first success, and ignorant of the approach of Tengia Boo, imagined that they should meet no further impediment until they reached the Birman capital. With that persuasion, they continued their march, and, deviating from the most frequented road, probably for the convenience of forage, pursued another route by the village of Chenghio. Amiou-mee, though repulsed, still kept hovering on the skirts of the Chinese army; which had proceeded only two days farther, to a town called Chiboo, when the division commanded by Tengia Boo suddenly appeared in their rear. Ledougmee, the Governor of Quantong, approached at the same time, with his party: thus inclosed on all sides, a retreat became impracticable, and to advance was desperate. The Tartar cavalry, on whose vigour and activity the Chinese army depended for provision, could no longer venture out, either to procure supplies, or protect convoys. In this situation, the Birmans attacked the enemy with impetuosity, while, on the other hand, the defence made by the Chinese was equally resolute. The conflict had lasted three days, when the Chinese, in an effort of despair, tried to cut their way through the division commanded by Amiou-mee, that occupied the road by which a retreat seemed least difficult. This last attempt proved fatal ; Amiou-mee's troops, certain of support, maintained their ground until the coming up of Tengia Boo, which decided the fortune of the day. The harassed Chinese now sunk under the pressure of superior numbers, and the carnage was dreadful. Birmans, when victorious, are the most unpitying and ferocious monsters on earth. Death, or rigorous slavery, is the certain doom of those they subdue in battle: of the Chinese army, not a man returned to his native country ; about 2500 were preserved from the sword, and conducted in fetters to the capital, where an exclusive quarter in the suburbs of the city was assigned for their residence. Those who did not understand any particular handicraft were employed in making gardens, and in the business of husbandry: mechanics and artificers were compelled to ply their trades according to the royal pleasure, without any other reward for their labour than a bare subsistence. These people, however, were encouraged, as are all strangers, to marry Birman wives, and consider themselves natives of the country. Compliance with so hospitable and general an invitation, confers even on slaves taken in war certain immunities, from which those who refuse the connexion are by law debarred.

This custom, in which the Birmans

follow the example of the wisest and best governed nations of antiquity, is singular amongst the civilized countries of the East; and peculiarly remarkable in a people who believe in the Shaster, and derive their religious tenets from an Hindoo source; who are surrounded also by kingdoms where women are kept inviolably sacred from the sight and converse of strangers, and where the exclusive system of casts or tribes admits of no proselytes. It is well known, that even the public prostitutes of China are strictly prohibited from having intercourse with any other than a Chinese; nor is any foreign woman permitted to enter the territories, or visit the ports of that jealous nation. The Hindoo women of rank are no less inaccessible; and admission into a respectable cast is not attainable by money. To such narrow prejudices the Birmans are superior; with a Lacedemonian liberality, they deny not the comforts of connubial commerce to men of whatever climate or complexion. They are sensible, that the strength of an empire consists in its population, and that a prince is great and powerful, more from the number of his subjects, than from the extent of his territory: hence the politic indulgence that the Birman government grants to every sect freely to exercise its religious rites: they tolerate alike the Pagan and the Jew, the Mussulman or Christian, the disciples of Confucius, or the worshippers of Fire; the children of whom, born of a Birman woman, equally become subjects of the state, and are entitled to the same protection and privileges, as if they had sprung from a line of Birman ancestry.

When Shembuan succeeded to the throne, he removed the seat of government from Chagaing, the residence of his brother and immediate predecessor, to Monchaboo, where his father Alompra had kept his court. With this situation also he became discontented; and, it is said from certain superstitious reasons suggested by astrologers, again changed his abode, and made Awa Haung, or ancient Ava, the metropolis of the empire. The city, which had fallen into ruin, was quickly rebuilt; new keoums* and praws† arose; a strong stockade was erected; and the fortifications, which had been neglected since the expulsion of Nuttoon, were put into a respectable state of repair.

The brilliant success that attended the recent irruption of the Birmans into the Siamese country was productive of no permanent advantages: though beaten, the Siamese were far from being a subjugated people. The inherent enmity that subsists between these two nations, will probably prevent the passive vassalage of one to the other, unless broken by such repeated defeats as must nearly amount to extirpation. Soon after Deebedee had led his army within the confines of the Birman dominions, the yoke of the conquerors was disclaimed in Dwarawuddy: a man named Pieticksing, a relation of the king, and one who held an official station about his person, had, previous to the capitulation, retired to a town at some distance, attended by his followers. As soon as it was known that the Birmans had withdrawn into their own territories, he returned, at the head of a numerous troop of adherents, by whose aid he easily displaced the new government, and abolished the regulations made by the Birman general. The king, who had pusillanimously abandoned his throne and people, is said to have perished in the woods, but through what means is not clearly ascertained; probably by the dagger of the usurper, who, having gained over the populace and conciliated some men of influence, found few obstacles to impede his way to the throne.

Deebedee, who had so eminently distinguished himself, was received on his return to Ava with many flattering demonstrations of applause; his Tsaloe, or cord of nobility, was increased from six to nine strings, and he was farther honoured with the title of Na-ma-boo-dee, or most illustrious commander. The Chinese being vanquished, and the Peguers to appearance so depressed as to leave no apprehension of disturbance to the state, Deebedee was again detached to punish the contumacious Siamese, and reduce them to vassalage and submission. He left Ava on this service, with a fleet of war-boats, early in the monsoon of the year 1771: the troops were debarked at Rangoon, and proceeded thence by land. On this occasion, the Siamese anticipated the intention of the Birman general, and met him in force on the frontiers, where the opposition he experienced from the enemy, and the difficulty of passing the rivers, which had not yet subsided, were such as to oblige him to retreat; he encamped on the borders of the Sitang river, whence he wrote to Ava to represent the necessity of sending him further reinforcements.

In consequence of this application, Chedookaminee, who had served on the former expedition, received a commission, appointing him Maywoon or Viceroy of Martaban, and of all the possessions belonging to the Birmans southward of Martaban. This officer was ordered to make the levies necessary for the assistance of Deebedee within his jurisdiction; after which he was to join that general, act in concert with him, and, uniting their forces, recommence hostilities against the Siamese.

The southern provinces, over which the authority of Chedookaminee extended, were chiefly inhabited by the families of Taliens, or Peguers, who had either voluntarily left, or were expelled from the ancient city of Pegue, from Dalla, and the districts adjacent; and out of these Chedookaminee was obliged to form his new levies. The Peguers, who were then supposed to be sufficiently reconciled to the Birman government, and considered, in many respects, as naturalized subjects of the state, were accordingly required to contribute to the public exigencies, by furnishing men and money, in like proportion as the native Birmans. In fact, the southern countries were not capable of supplying Birman recruits sufficient for an army; but the confidence reposed in the Peguers was, in this instance, fatally misplaced, and their treachery averted from the Siamese the gathering storm.

Deebedee, probably disgusted by the appointment of Chedookaminee to the Maywoonship of Martaban, obtained permission to retire from the army, and return to the capital: on his departure, Chedookaminee succeeded to the sole command.

Among the troops thus raised, were three popular chieftains of the Talien nation, named Tellakien, Tellasien, and Meenatzji, men of enterprizing, intriguing spirit, and of great influence amongst their people. The Peguers thus collected in a body, and provided with arms, became conscious of their own strength; a sense of which, stimulated by the influence of their chieftains, inspired them with a desire to regain their empire, and retaliate their wrongs on their oppressors. The army was assembled at Martaban when the conspiracy was formed: at the close of the first day's march, the Peguers suddenly rose upon their Birman companions, and commenced an indiscriminate massacre; the officer second in command of the Birman army was slain, and those who escaped the fury of the assassins fled into the woods. Chedookaminee himself, accompanied by 500 followers, with difficulty effected a retreat to Rangoon; the elated Peguers followed the blow, and pursued the fugitives to the very gates of the city, where, their numbers increasing, they formed an encampment, and commenced a regular siege.

Rangoon could not have been attacked at a time when it was worse prepared for defence. Imaginary security had lulled the Birman into unsuspecting repose. The Maywoon of Pegue, whose residence was in Rangoon, had, a short time before, proceeded on an annual visit of homage to the capital, accompanied by the principal officers of his government;

he had also taken with him the greatest part of the troops, particularly those who manned the war-boats; a hardy and ferocious tribe, who usually attend on the governor, or viceroy, on occasions of ceremony. During his absence, a lieutenant or chekey, named Shoe-dong-northa, commanded in the city, and by the gallant defence he made proved himself no undeserving substitute. News of the revolt quickly spread, and, from its first success, created a general alarm among the Birmans resident in the adjoining districts. The Miou-gees, or chief men of Henzada, Denoobew, and Padaung, assembled all the force they could collect, and in a spirited manner came down the river in light boats, and threw themselves into Rangoon, which stood in need of such timely succours. The Peguers thrice attempted to storm a strong stockade that encompassed the walls of the town, and were each time beaten off with serious loss. Intelligence of these events reaching court, the Maywoon, with his train of attendants, and a few additional troops, amounting in the whole to about 3000 men, were ordered to proceed without delay to the relief of Rangoon. The rapid stream of the Irrawaddy quickly transported this detachment to the place of its destination: the Peguers, on their approach, thought it most prudent to raise the siege, and, without making any further attempt to oppose the junction of the reinforcement, retired to the banks of the Saloenmeet. The arrival of the Viceroy of Rangoon was speedily followed by that of a still more respectable force, under an officer of the highest rank in the empire. Maha-see-soo-ra, one of the Woongces, or chief counsellors of state, was entrusted by the king with the conduct of the southern war, and the restoration of order in the disturbed provinces.

These events did not deter Shembuan from pursuing his favourite scheme of conquest to the westward. The fertile plains and populous towns of Munnipoora, and the Cassay Shaan, attracted his ambition. Early in the year 1774, a formidable force was sent against these places, under the command of three generals of distinction, Moung-wamaa, Captain of the king's guard, Oundaboo, and Kameouza. Part proceeded by water up the Keen-duem, and the remainder by land, taking the route of Monchaboo, Kaungnaa, and Naky-oun-mee; the armament by water arrived unexpectedly at a town called Nerting, where the Birmans, landing, surprised and carried away 150 women who were employed in the labours of the harvest. Monadella, the Raja of Nerting, made an ineffectual attempt to rescue the captives: he fell after a gallant struggle, and 250 of his followers lost their lives. The Birmans, having ravaged the country, and committed many acts of wanton barbarity, proceeded to join the detachment that advanced by land: when the forces were united, they marched towards Munnipoora, the Raja of which came forth to meet the enemy, and gave them battle at a village called Ampatalla, fourteen miles short of Munnipoora. The conflict was long and obstinate, but fortune in the end favoured the Birmans; the Munnipoora Raja fled from the field of battle to his capital, where confusion and terror prevailed: thence he withdrew to the Corrun hills, five days' journey north-west of Munnipoora, accompanied by his family, and carrying with him his most valuable effects. The city of Munnipoora submitted to the conqueror, who took possession of whatever the inhabitants had not been able to remove or conceal. The spoils, consisting chiefly of merchandize, and vessels of gold and silver, were forwarded to the golden feet, together with 2000 prisoners of both sexes.

Having reduced the Munnipooreans, Oundaboo left to his colleagues, Moungwamaa and Kamecouza, the task of enforcing submission from the Cassay Shaan, and several neighbouring petty states; whilst, putting himself at the head of 10,000 men, unincumbered with baggage or artillery, he marched against Chawal, Raja of Cachar, who possessed the independent sovereignty of a rich, though mountainous, territory north-west of Munnipoora. In his progress he overcame Anousping, prince of a country called Muggaloo*; thence he is said to have penetrated within the Hamalaya hills, which form a continuation of the lofty Imaus, and seem to be a barrier raised by nature to protect the mild unwarlike inhabitants of India from the more hardy natives of the East, who, unrestrained by such impediments, would ages since have spread desolation along the fertile banks of the Burhampooter and the Ganges. Pursuing his conquests, Oundaboo advanced within three days' march of Cospore†, the capital of Cachar, passing many rugged mountains and pleasant valleys embosomed in their range.

Chawal, aware of the storm with which he was threatened, had taken the necessary precautions for his own security. He joined in a defensive league with the lesser rajahs of the hills; who, though waging endless warfare with each other, united in the hour of danger to repel the common enemy. The chief of these was the Prince of Jointy, surnamed the Gos-sain Raja. Oundaboo, blinded by the ambition of conquest, imprudently pressed forward, until he found himself environed with difficulties that he could not hope to surmount, and from which there was now no retreat. To complete his misfortunes, that deadly disease too fatally known to British troops by the name of the hill fever, had spread its baneful influence through the Birman ranks ; famine and pestilence accomplished what the swords of the mountaineers could never have effected. Oundaboo's troops dispersed, and in the defiles of the mountains and the mazes of the forests were cut off by the natives in detail, or perished the unresisting victims of a supernatural foe.

The misfortunes of Oundaboo and his army, instead of intimidating the Birmans, excited an insatiable spirit of revenge. Kameouza undertook to exact retribution from the Cachars, for the blood of his slaughtered countrymen ; Moungwamaa remained at Munnipoora, with a garrison sufficient to defend the fort ; whilst Kameouza marched against Chawal, with a yet greater force than had accompanied the unsuccessful general, whose error afforded an useful lesson to his successor. Avoiding the rash haste made by his predecessor, this more prudent leader diligently explored his ground, halting wherever subsistence could be collected, with which many of the rich and luxuriant valleys of Cachar abounded: thus continuing a cautious progress, he penetrated as far as the pass of Inchamutty*, two days' journey from Cospore, where he was met by a deputation from the Raja to solicit peace. Kameouza prescribed terms, which, though severe and humiliating, were accepted. Chawal consented to pay, besides a sum of money, the abject homage of a maiden of the royal blood to the King of Ava, and to send him a tree with the roots bound in their native clay; thereby indicating, that both person and property were at the disposal of his sovereign pleasure; these acts being considered as the most unequivocal proofs of vassalage, expressing, on one hand, the extreme of submission, and on the other, the most absolute power.

Kamcouza, in his return to Munnipoora, chastised a race of mountaineers named Keingce, by whom he had been harassed in his march, burning several of their villages in the districts of Bodasser and Chaumgaut. Raja Anoupsing likewise made his submission; and repossession of Munnipoora was granted to the fugitive prince, on condition of paying an annual tribute, and offering the acknowledgment of a royal virgin, and a tree. Matters being thus adjusted, the Birmans returned to their own country, having lost above 20,000 men, from the commencement to the close of the expedition, by the various casualties of war.

These victories only lent a transitory splendor to the Birman arms, without contributing to the real and permanent advantage of the state ; it was impossible to keep possession of the tracts they had over-run, the towns they had stormed, and the countries they had subdued. The Birman nation was far from being populous, in proportion to its widely extended empire. To retain the late acquisition of Pegue, and keep in subjection its discontented and numerous inhabitants, required the utmost vigilance, and occupied all the troops that could with prudence be spared. Oaths of allegiance are considered by eastern vassals as obligations of convenience, as mere nugatory forms, to be observed no longer than there is power to punish a breach of them; the conquests made by the Birmanians to the westward, therefore, were attended with no other effect, than to add to their native arrogance, and to increase their already inordinate pride.

The Peguers, as before related, having raised the siege of Rangoon, had returned to the Saloenmeet, or the Martaban river, when Maha-see-soo-ra, to whom the management of the southern war was intrusted, arrived at Rangoon with an additional reinforcement of troops, and several pieces of artillery. Having augmented his strength with the soldiers that accompanied the Maywoon, and drafted part of the garrison, his army amounted to 20,000 men; whilst twenty-four pieces of ordnance rendered him formidable to foes casually armed with whatever weapons they could procure.

With this respectable equipment Maha-see-soo-ra took the field about the end of the year 1774. The enemy were in possession of Martaban, and had collected, from various quarters, a discordant rabble, ill provided with necessaries, and altogether unamenable to control; from whom the Birman commander met with little opposition, in a march rendered tedious by the transportation of heavy guns, and the difficulty of crossing the numerous watercourses that intersect the lower country. On reaching the vicinity of Martaban, overtures of a pacific nature were made by the rebel leaders, which were rejected with contempt and menace: the Peguers in despair shut themselves within the fort; a siege was commenced, and sustained for a considerable time. The Peguers, however, were at length forced to yield. Tellasien and Meenatzzi, with several of their adherents, effected an escape to Siam; but Tellakien was not so fortunate; he was captured in the fort, with many others, and, being a leader of the rebellion, his fate was reserved for the decision of his sovereign.

Maha-sce-soo-ra was preparing to carry the war into the country of the Siamese, when he received intelligence of the intentions of the king to visit Rangoon in person: this circumstance, together with the little probability of his being able to advance far before the season* when the Shembuan having repelled the formidable invasion of one enemy, and carried his victorious arms into the territory of another, and having, by prudent conduct, established his throne on the strong foundations of terror and respect, conceived that his presence would contribute to a more speedy termination of the troubles that agitated the lower provinces, and more effectually destroy the seeds of disaffection among the Peguers, which had so often, at intervals, broke out into open rebellion. dous size, where Gaudma, the Birman and Pegue object of religious worship, was, from time immemorial, accustomed to receive at an annual festival the adorations of the devout, had, in the year 1769, suffered much damage from an earthquake; in particular the Tee, or umbrella, which, composed of open iron-work, crowned the spire, had been thrown down by the concussion, and rendered irreparable from the fall. In the Birman empire, a pagoda is not deemed sanctified until it receives the umbrella; and the erection of this last, but most important appendage, is an act of high solemnity. Shembuan, who on this occasion is said to have covered policy with the cloak of religion, caused a new and magnificent Tee to be constructed at Ava, and declared his intention to assist in person at the ceremony of putting it on. For this avowed purpose he left his capital, attended by a numerous train of Birman nobility, whilst, to increase the pride and pageantry of the display, Beinga Della, the unfortunate monarch of Pegue, who had surrendered his sceptre and person to Alompra, was led captive in the procession. An army of 50,000 men composed the body guard: this splendid array, having embarked in boats, sailed down the Irrawaddy, and arrived at Rangoon in the month of October 1775. Tella-kien, the Pegue rebel, who had been sent up the country loaded with irons, met the king at the town of Denoobew, and expiated his treason by a painful death.

Whatever respect the glory of conquest, and the wisdom of a well regulated government, might attach to the reign of Shembuan, it must be wholly obscured by the cruelty exercised on the present occasion towards his royal prisoner, the unhappy king of Pegue; and this too, like a more recent and equally inhuman regicide, in a nation professing Christianity and enlightened by Science, was perpetrated under the mockery of justice. Shembuan, not content with exhibiting to the humbled Peguers their venerable and yet venerated monarch, bound in fetters, and bowed down with years and anguish, resolved to take away his life, and render the disgrace still deeper, by exposing him as a public malefactor, to suffer under the stroke of the common executioner. In most countries to the east of Bengal, decapitation is the punishment allotted for common thieves; and he who inflicts the sentence is usually a culprit that has once been convicted of the crime. To die by such a hand, is deemed an ignominy which the Birmans dread even worse than death itself; but for any subject to spill royal blood, is forbidden by the Birman and Pegue laws, as an act of inexpiable impiety; nevertheless the unfeeling Shembuan, regardless of law and devoid of humanity, issued orders for his ill-fated prisoner to prepare for trial on a charge of high treason.

The process of law, in Birman courts of justice, is conducted with as much formality as in any country on earth. Beinga Della was brought before the judges of the Rhoom, among whom the Maywoon of Pegue* presided. The late king of Pegue was there accused of having been privy to, and instrumental in, exciting the late rebellion. Depositions of several witnesses, supposed to be suborned, were taken; the prisoner denied the charge; but his fate being determined on, his plea availed him nothing. He was found guilty; and the proceedings, according to custom, were laid before the King, who passed sentence of death, and accompanied it with an order for speedy execution.

* In the absence of the King, the Maywoon, or viceroy, never attends in person at the Rhoom; he then represents the King; remains in his palace, and receives the report of the judges; to which he applies the law, and finally awards the sentence.

In conformity to this cruel mandate, on the 7th of the increasing moon, in the month Taboung, the aged victim was led, in public procession, through an insulting populace, to a place called Awa-bock, three miles without the city, where he met his doom with fortitude, and had no distinction paid him above the meanest criminal, except that all the municipal officers attended in their robes of ceremony to witness his last moments.

State necessity is sometimes found to be incompatible with individual justice, and, on some occasions, must be allowed to plead for measures which, abstractedly considered, seem harsh, and bear hard upon particular members of the community; but such necessity, to be admissible, should be made unequivocally evident. Men whose designs against the public peace cannot be doubted ought to be restrained by the hand of coercion, even before the commission of any overt act to which the law attaches: the proof of intention warrants and demands such interference. A despot, who dreads the extinction of his power, and the loss of his crown, will resort to unjustifiable means to remove the object of his jealousy, and anticipate on his enemy the meditated blow; but the circumstances of the present case appear neither to admit of palliation nor excuse: the security of the state was not endangered, and no rivalry could be dreaded. The Pegue king had passed more than twenty years a contented and inoffensive prisoner: had he been only suspected of encouraging his former subjects in any one of their several attempts at emancipation, his life would have paid the forfeit of his temerity; but, in the last instance, when bending under the pressure of years and infirmity, there was scarce a possibility of his being accessory to so daring a revolt. On the part of the Birman monarch, it was a wanton and barbarous display of power, designed, perhaps, as a humiliating spectacle to the Peguers, whose attachment to their ancient sovereign bordered on idolatry. It casts a deep shade over a splendid reign, and justly brands the memory of Shembuan with the odious appellation of tyrant.

The execution of many Taliens of rank followed that of the king ; all who were suspected of having borne a part in the late rebellion, and all whose influence rendered them formidable, were included in the list of the proscribed. Several fled from persecution, and, after the storm blew over, settled in Tongho, or the tributary provinces of Zemee, Sandepoora, and the districts adjacent.

These are among the last transactions of Shembuan's life : after duly solemnizing the ceremony of putting on the Tee, he prepared to return to his capital, having given instructions to his general, Maha-see-soo-ra, to prosecute the war against the Siamese.

In the beginning of the year 1776, Shembuan left Rangoon with the same retinue and in the same pomp which before attended him. During the early stages of his progress, he felt the first symptoms of his mortal illness. Alarmed at the danger, and impatient under his sufferings, he quitted his slow-drawn boat of state, and, embarking in a lighter vessel, hastened to his capital, hoping there to find relief; but his days were numbered, and he was doomed shortly to resign his diadem and life to that Power which disregards even the boasted immortality of Birman kings.

Languishing under a slow fever, and distempered with scrofula, Shembuan obtained little benefit from the efficacy of medicine. In order to breathe a freer air, he changed the fort of Ava for the open plains : temporary wooden houses were erected on the highest banks that overhung the stream, and on spots to which superstition pointed as the site of health. But the skill of astrologers proved fallacious, and no wind that blew wafted alleviation to his pains : after fatiguing himself by frequent removals, he felt that it was but an useless aggravation of his sufferings ; hopeless of life, he returned to the fort to prepare for the last scene, and settle the affairs of the empire and the succession to the throne.

Shembuan had two sons, Cheriguza and Chelenza, by different mothers ; the first, at this time eighteen years of age, was born of the principal queen ; the latter, not more than thirteen, the offspring of a favourite concubine. Competition between these brothers was an event scarcely to be dreaded ; and Momcin, the son of Namdogee Praw, seemed to be too closely immured in monastic privacy, to raise a bar to the succession. Nevertheless Shembuan took every prudent precaution to transmit an undisputed sceptre : he exacted from the nobility a solemn promise of allegiance to his heir, which the respect entertained for the character of the father inclined few to withhold from the son. Having satisfactorily adjusted his temporal concerns, the monarch yielded up his breath in the city of Ava, about the middle of spring in the year 1776.

The character of Shembuan is that of an austere, intelligent, and active prince.

He reduced to a state of permanent vassalage the petty sovereigns of several neighbouring provinces, who had before only yielded to desultory conquest: these he compelled, as Chobwas, or tributary princes, to repair in person, or by representatives, at stated periods, to his capital, and pay homage at the golden feet; among them are numbered the lords of Sandepoora (Cambodia), Zemec, Quantong, Bamoo, and others; together with several less civilized* tribes, inhabiting the western hills, and the mountainous tracts that intersect the country eastward of the river Irrawaddy.

Shembuan was in most points a superstitious observer of the rites and precepts of the Birman religion, which originating, as it indisputably does, from the same source as that of the Hindoos, differs nevertheless from the latter in many essential tenets. Admitting the sanctity, and reverencing the learning of the Braminical sect, the Birmans, votaries of Buddho Tachor, altogether deny the supremacy of the Bramin professors over their Rhahaans, or Phonghis. The Birmans, Peguers, and Siamese, as well as all nations whose fundamental principles of religion can be traced to the Hindoo system, and who acknowledge the Shanscrit as their holy text, unite in one benevolent doctrine, the sinfulness of depriving any animal of life, to satisfy a carnivorous appetite. To eat flesh, is not deemed a crime by the Birmans; but he who eats it is not exempt from sin, unless the creature died a natural death, or was slain by accident, or by other hands. This precept of the church, it may be supposed, is not very scrupulously observed, and in many parts of the empire is wholly disregarded, except by the priesthood, who never even prepare their own victuals. Mandates have been issued by viceroys, and proclamations gone forth from the golden palace, to enjoin obedience to the sacred law; but these were little more than expiatory manifestoes, suggested by remorse, danger, or superstition. It is likewise at times used as an instrument of venal oppression; the greedy retainers of the law being entitled to a certain quota of the fine levied from a convicted delinquent. Shembuan, strongly tinctured with bigotry, often, in the course of his reign, repeated the pious prohibition, with no other effect than causing that to be done in secret, which before the order little precaution had been used to conceal.

On the demise of Shembuan, it does not appear that any effort was made, either by Momcin himself, or the nobles attached to his father, to recover a throne from which he was most unjustly debarred. Chenguza ascended without opposition, and assumed the government, at a juncture when the flourishing state of public affairs held out a flattering prospect of an auspicious reign.

But in the succession to sovereignty, it sometimes happens, as in the succession to an estate, that he who comes to the fairest inheritance does not always prove a benefactor to his realm and his subjects, or his tenants and demesnes. Numerous errors will, and ought to be forgiven, in the presumptive heir to an high public trust, or an affluent private property ; but a radical want of honest principle, and a long continued course of base and licentious conduct, never fail in time to alienate the affections of men, whether subjects or tenantry, however inclined they may be to venerate the virtues of the sire in the person of the son. Even the jus divinum, so strenuously inculcated by the Birman articles of political faith, did not, in the end, prove sufficiently strong to protect from violence a throne polluted by the lowest profligacy, and disgraced by an open violation of every moral and religious duty.

With all the advantages arising from his father's memory, and with a government thoroughly established in power, Chenguza commenced his reign: but these distinctions he studied by every means in his power to abuse. His first imprudent act was to recal the army from the southward, which, shortly after the departure of Shembuan, had marched from Martaban under Maha-see-soo-ra, and had commenced operations against the Siamese. This general, Chenguza not only displaced from his military command, but likewise degraded from his high ministerial office of Woongee, or chief counsellor of state; a measure that drew on himself much odium, as Maha-see-soo-ra was a person of conciliatory manners, and an officer of approved integrity and valour.

The other parts of Chenguza's conduct corresponded with this arbitrary outset, and he plunged at once into the most shameless debauchery. Not content with repealing the edicts of his father against the use of spirituous liquors, he exhibited in his own person an example of ebriety and dissipation: stimulated by jealousy, he caused his younger brother, Chilenza, to be put to death: he submitted the affairs of his empire to be administered by favourites, and accustomed himself to be absent from his capital whole months together, indulging in rural sports and carousals, and preferring his hunting seats, on the borders of deep forests, to the splendid piasath * of the royal palace. In the year 1779, his father's younger brother, Terroug-mee †, incurred the suspicion of the tyrant, and fell a victim to his jealousy: Pagahm-mee, another of his uncles, was kept a close prisoner in the fort of Ava, under a pretext that he was plotting against the state : his uncle, Minderagee Praw, the present king, resided sometimes at Chagaing, and sometimes at Monchaboo ; and though he affected to live in the most inoffensive obscurity, was nevertheless vigilantly watched by the minions of the palace.

Agrecably to the usage of the Birman court, Chenguza had early been betrothed to a relation* of his own : this marriage proving unfruitful, he espoused, as his second wife, the daughter of one of the Attawoons† of the court, a young woman endowed with virtue, beauty, and accomplishments. Although it was generally believed that he was extremely fond of this wife, yet the irritation of an intemperate life, together with a disposition from nature prone to jealousy, caused them to live on terms of unceasing discord. One day, actuated by an impulse of sudden rage, he accused her of infidelity ; and without allowing himself time to judge dispassionately, or suffering the unhappy princess to vindicate herself, he pronounced sentence of immediate death. There are wretches in every nation ready to execute the sanguinary mandates of a cruel tyrant ; the trembling and innocent victim was dragged from the palace, and inclosed in a sack of scarlet cloth, richly ornamented : thus confined, she was put on board a boat*, when, the sack being suspended between the narrow necks of two earthen jars †, the whole was sunk in the deepest part of the Irrawaddy. The jars filling, carried the body down, and prevented emersion. This diabolical act was perpetrated in open day, before thousands of spectators, amongst whom were many of her friends and relations. Her afflicted father, overwhelmed with anguish and deprived of all his offices, retired in despair to the city of Chagaing.

The universal disgust that a conduct so flagitious could not fail to raise, even in the most depraved society, caused the majority of the nobles, and the great body of the people, anxiously to desire a change. Under such a dominion, no man's life was secure from becoming a sacrifice to the caprice of an intoxicated barbarian, or the personal enmity of some despicable parasite : at such a juncture, the eyes of all were naturally turned to the rightful heir, who had now attained the years of manhood. The retreat chosen for Momiën, was the Keoum and Praw of Loga-ther-poo, an inconsiderable distance from the fort of Ava, where, protected by his sacerdotal habit, by the influence of his aunt, and perhaps, above all, by his own want of capacity and personal insignificance, the tyrant had hitherto considered him as an object too contemptible for notice ; little imagining that the simple Phonghi was one day to be, in the hands of others, the instrument of his destruction.

A conspiracy was the result of the discontents of the people and the misconduct of the prince. The principal actors were Shembuan Minderagee Praw*, the Attawoon before-mentioned, and Maha-sec-soo-ra, the degraded minister. These personages easily gained the monks over to their side, who, though less willing to meddle in state affairs than is customary with their order in many countries, yet, being exasperated by the open contempt that Chenguza manifested for religion, its rights and ministers, secretly lent their aid to bring about a change, which, by placing Momien, their illustrious disciple, on the throne, promised to advance the interests of the church. Momien was accordingly tutored for the part he was to act, and nothing remained but to embrace a favourable moment to execute the projected revolution.

During Chenguza's reign, military operations seem to have been wholly suspended ; whilst the neighbouring nations, the Chinese, the Siamese, and Cassayers, had so recently experienced the power of the Birman arms, that they felt no inclination to stand forth as aggressors. Repeated defeats and severe penal laws crushed the spirit of revolt among the Peguers, who appeared to acquiesce in their subjugated state. The Anoupectoumeou, or great western mountains, had not in the present dynasty been crossed by an hostile army; the tranquillity of the empire, therefore, during the six years that Chenguza wore the crown, compensated, in some measure, for the licentiousness that was introduced among the people. Population increased, and tracts of land were cultivated, which under a more warlike prince would probably have continued an unproductive waste.

After matters were in readiness, the first opportunity of acting occurred in the month of November 1781. Chenguza had gone to Keoptaloun, a town on the banks of the river, about thirty miles below Ava, to celebrate an high festival. As he never observed any regular times
